MR. EDITOR: Allow me a word of explanation. Mr. Reynolds still entertains discordant feelings toward the brethren in and around Fall River, Kansas. His prominence in the ranks of Liberalism makes this little episode in his experience a matter of regret. His response to my letter of some weeks ago does not bring him in any closer communion with the brethren. We are sorry that the brother allowed his spleen to get the better of his judgment. States and individuals are not annihilated by a mere stroke of the pen in the hands of a Liberal lecturer, and it is foolishness to presume so. Mr. Reynolds met but few Liberals during his stay in our city. He was sadly out of joint before he reached us. He missed connection with the passenger train, and landed, some three hours afterward, on a freight train. No friendly Liberal met him at the depot to extend to him the welcome he anticipated. He had to seek his own lodging, and was not as fortunate as he would hav been had he materialized on the regular train. Nature was having a spasm, known as a blizzard, and had it bad. But two lectures had been advertised, and Mr. Reynolds forthwith began to clamor for three. At no time could the surroundings hav been more unfavorable. Mr. Somerby, of the Times, had done the corresponding, engaged for two lectures, published dates and subjects—then passed the matter to O. W. Bomig, owner of the Opera Hall. Mr. Bomig was to attend to the further details. At the time Mr. Bomig was absent at Howard, having been elected county commissioner for Elk county and this being the time for filing his official bond and being installed into office. In all this jumble of unavoidables, Mr. Reynolds proceeded to deliver one, two, three lectures, and demanded pay. If the brethren of Fall River hav not paid him for all the services contracted, they will do so. This they will do, and nothing more.

Mr. Reynolds reiterates that he writes things as he finds them. The man, P. Van Hyatt, that needs evoluting, and whose word was distrusted by the landlord, when the baggage was being held for board, was not in Fall River during the sojourn of Mr. Reynolds. Van Hyatt livs five miles south of Fall River, and had too much respect for his nasal protuberance to poke it into the face of the blizzard that was then on exhibition. He was not so hungry for the bread of life as to be guilty of any suicidal exposures. Had the elements been propitious, the man Van Hyatt would hav materialized, as is his custom on such occasions. Van Hyatt had nothing to do with any arrangement connected with this episode—is not in any way responsible for any of the unfortunate circumstances that produced a failure. He has a fair knowledge of Liberalism in the West, and knows that the brethren in and around Fall River will compare favorably with those in other localities, the opinion of Mr. Reynolds to the contrary notwithstanding. It is not the purpose of this brief reply to widen the breach by the use of cutting remarks. If Mr. Reynolds desires to evolute Van Hyatt and Company, he must change his tactics. He must anoint his eyes until he no longer sees men as trees walking—anoint his eyes until he no longer sees Van Hyatt stand up and vouch for the payment of a board bill, when Van Hyatt was five miles away, and knew nothing of what was transpiring in Israel. This makes up our case. We will add nothing more. We are not fond of wordy warfare. But little good comes of it. We desired to place ourselvs in a proper light with the brethren. We hav stood up and explained, and are satisfied to abide results. P. VAN HYATT.

NEW YORK, March 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I desire to express my thanks for your very generous and extended reply to my letter on Dr. Samson's criticisms of Kuenen. I am to a great extent in sympathy with the present policy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I sincerely regret my omission in not acquainting you with the object I had in view, in addition to the suggestion that a reply made by you would undoubtedly interest a number of your readers. I conclude thus for the reason that a score or more of my most intimate friends hav sent me tender epistles of solicitous regard for my seemingly inexplicable attitude, accompanied by voluminous dissertations on the various points so kindly elucidated by yourself. One correspondent wishes to know whether I am trying to "pose as a supplemental edition of Taxil;" another proposes to "institute a commission of inquiry for the purpose of investigating the effect of blizzards on the intellect;" I hav been consecutivly accused of having a "big head," a "little head," and "no head at all," and although I hav been a Benedict for only about two months, one of my facetious friends had the temerity to insinuate that it was a "clear case of mother-in-law." While this may be a just punishment for my negligence, it also affords me much pleasure in learning that I hav been the cause of so much healthful merriment, and at the same time the means of eliciting one of the ablest and most interesting editorials that hav ever graced the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER. An editor's opinions are more carefully perused, receive more attention from the religious press and other papers holding opposit views, arouse more enthusiasm among their co-laborers, and are a more potent factor in the direction of education. They also stimulate the thought of many who either from lack of time or from indifference seldom evince much interest in the other departments of a large periodical. At all events, I believe that I voice the sentiment of a goodly part of the TRUTH SEEKER readers in saying that its editorials are one of its principal features—and especially is this true of your article on "Mr. Moses as an Author." I am glad, for this reason, that my letter received the prominence you gave it, for although we may feel perfectly free in acknowledging that the generally received account of the authorship of the first five books of the Old Testament is repudiated by all Christian scholars of any note, still, we are compelled to admit that the position occupied by Dr. Samson is as yet a very common one, and is vociferously promulgated by such apostles of religious forgery as Sam Jones, Sam Small, Hastings, Talmage, "Boy Preacher" Harrison, and some fifty thousand other greater or less pulpit lights in this country alone.

I will not deny that Mr. Samson's lecture possesses very little intrinsic merit, but we all know, or should know, that lectures of this character are being continually circulated at the instigation of the clergy, and there is certainly no better way of calling public attention to their pernicious influence than through an editorial, in such form as to be at the same time readily utilized as a missionary document.

The church still thrives on credulity. Superstition is by no means extinct. It is true that the church is not as ready as formerly to defend her doctrins and beliefs in public debate. It is true that she has lost a vast amount of power. But this result has been accomplished only through perpetual agitation.

Despite all this—despite martyrdom; despite the sacrifices of life, home, and position by thousands of brave men and women in the pursuit of knowledge; despite the bloody history of the past—all the religious wars, intrigues, and assassinations—despite the valuable lesson the experiences of nineteen centuries should hav taught the world, persecution has not ceased; efforts are unceasingly made to unite church and state; the importance of securing the Catholic vote is never underrated by the wily politician, and leading dailies frequently devote whole columns to the nauseating emanations from those sewers of intellectual annihilation called Sunday pulpits, while scientific and philosophic questions, with a few exceptions, receive but a passing notice.

These statements furnish their own argument. The only essential for their verification is observation.

Some of my critics are supersensitiv on this point; they are averse to religious discussions. The trouble with them is that they assume too much; they liv in an atmosphere of ideality, and either ignore or are totally oblivious to everyday facts; they forget that Secularism includes, or should include, every phase of human existence, and that its object is to eliminate error, the brutality of superstition, and the chief cause of unhappiness—ignorance.

These critics are fond of falling back on the assertion that nothing new can be said, taking it for granted that every man, woman, and child has not only heard of but thoroughly assimilated the erudite productions of Spinoza, Simon, Leclerc, Vandall, Vater, De Wette, Schumann, Hartmann, Ammon, Von Bohlen, Colenso, Robertson, Smith, Kuenen, and many other eminent biblicists. Well, granted that absolutely nothing new can be said; but what of it? If it were possible to furnish the names of twenty million more writers of equal eminence, the fact nevertheless remains that Young Men's Christian Associations are still in possession of a vast amount of valuable property; there are yet hundreds of partial and unjust laws on our statute books; chaplains are not all dead; sectarian institutions continue to rob public treasuries on the plea of charity; churches wax fat on the non-taxable plan; ministers are, as ever, "called" to preach; history receives an icy bath every time the causes of the Reformation are discussed in our public schools, because the parents of Catholic children giv vent to loud wails of indignation—and each wail portends the eventual suppression of another truth—and the God-in-the-Constitution party are adding to their number daily. And right here kindly allow me to offer a suggestion, and that is that some of these Rip Van Winkles of Freethought take a few Turkish baths or a thorough course of spring medicin; it might materially assist them in getting rid of a superabundance of "innocuous desuetude."

This condition of ideal obliviousness to facts would be a commendable occupation for a consumptiv in a graveyard, but as an element in the emancipation of the masses from the thraldom of priestcraft it has a decidedly dubious aspect.

There is plenty of work for every Freethinker. Investigation will not cease because Charles Darwin was a naturalist, while there are thousands ignorant of his valuable contributions to science. Although Herbert Spencer has written learnedly upon social problems, there is no danger of the millennium arriving until a long time after the North Pole has been secured for a Bowery museum. Ingersoll may be, or is, the greatest orator the world has ever produced, but public speaking will go on after his grand form has been given back to Mother Earth. And so with respect to biblical controversies—they will be necessary just as long as the church continues to preach what she cannot practice and to teach that which she knows to be false.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Mule.

A mule was once on Christmas day
Presented with a wisp of hay;
Of which nor leaf nor stem he eats,
But in a hollow stump secretes.
With watchful canine optics wide,
Tray saw the beast his present hide,
And ventured then to ask him why
He thus should lay his fodder by.
"Then you shall know," the mule replied;
"'Tis for my children's use I hide."
"But what if you should hav no child?"
With soft, paternal grace he smiled,
And answered, "Then 'twill do, indeed,
To furnish my grandchildren feed."
This mule, no doubt, was pedigreed
Back to old Balaam's speaking breed;
Such wit and grace, you may depend,
In its beginning or its end,
Is due to some intelligence
That far surpasses human sense.

It Might Be Worse.

There was once a Persian poet,
Long ago,
Who was poor, as poets always are,
You know;
And he thought 'twas very hard
That so excellent a bard
Must go barefoot—trudging, trudging
To and fro.

So he fretted and he grumbled
At his fate,
And some misanthropic verses
Did create;
And he constantly inclined
To be hating all mankind
With a very bitter, bitter
Kind of hate.

But one day, as he was walking,
He did see
One whose feet were amputated
At the knee;
Who in lieu of finished legs
Must go stumping by on pegs,
More afflicted than the poet,
You'll agree.

Said the poet to his conscience:
"I am hit;
Henceforth you'll hear no whining,
Not a bit!"
And contentment from that time
Overflowed in all his rhyme,
And a most delightful, happy,
Jolly wit.

My Visit to India.

Tamsee went out in the morning, carrying a tin cup. I asked her if she was going for milk. She replied she was going on a bugging excursion. "Bugs!" said I to myself. "What in the world are they going to do with bugs?"

When Tamsee returned her cup was nearly full. They were fireflies, and every one was sewed on Annie's white dress that she was to wear at her party in the evening. Annie was dressed beautifully, with pearls and diamonds on her brow, tiny silver bells around her wrists and ankles, and bugs on her dress. I had never seen anything so dazzling since the great ocean display. Every motion of her head showed her pearls and diamonds to be of the first water, and the bugs gleamed and snapped at every turn. The party broke up at a late hour, but that very night the house was robbed.

The jewels that Annie had worn were placed in a sandalwood box, but Tamsee, instead of locking them in the safe as she ought to hav done, left them on the top of Annie's bureau. The next morning they were not to be found; neither was Joe, the head cook. A detectiv was put upon his trail, and in the afternoon he was discovered in a gambling den. He told the proprietor that he was intending to sail for Holland on the following day. All the jewels were found upon his person, and Joe was shut up in a prison. When he was there a week I was invited to go and visit him, which I accepted. I had been in the institution perhaps an hour, talking to poor Joe, when all at once I heard the voice of a parrot. It said: "Hullo, Joe! You blasted, copper-colored old thief!"

Her owner was surprised to hear such vigorous language from his pet, but the prisoners had been talking, and Polly had caught their phrases. Her owner reproved her severely, when she screamed out, "I didn't!"

It was visitors' day at the prison. At 4 o'clock the governor came in with great pomp and ceremony. He looked the prisoners over separately, and when he came to Joe, who was last on the list, at that moment Joe was taken with an uncontrolable fit of sneezing. When this was over, Joe left his work, and, rising slowly, made three very low bows, and then, turning around, he spat three times upon the ground, whirled about, turned his eyes upward, slapped his hands, and said in a loud tone, "God bless our noble governor!"

This was in accordance with an ancient custom of the country, and the governor, being Conservativ, was extremely pleased with this mark of respect. He was superstitious, and believed in signs and omens. The fact of Joe's sneezing was to him a sign that he should be pardoned, for, according to the traditions of the country, a sneeze betokened good luck to the sneezer; hence the governor said at once, "Young man, go thy way, and steal no more!"

Joe did not wait for a second bidding, but hastened away toward Mr. Preston's office. That gentleman was surprised to see his offending servant.

"What does this mean?" he questioned.

Joe told him that the governor had generously pardoned him, and he hoped Mr. Preston would do as much, and take him back to his service, and he solemnly promised he would never steal any more, forever.

After some hesitation, Mr. Preston decided to forgiv him and take him back again, so he went to the house and resumed his former occupation. Everyone seemed pleased to get Joe back again, for he was a great favorit with the entire family. Things went on swimmingly after this, only "Uncle Alick" seemed restless and unhappy, and no wonder, for he had no occupation, no work of any kind, and idle people are nearly always unhappy, that is, if they hav any brains to speak of. The poor man grew tired of lounging in the hammock, and really he did not know what to do with himself. One day, it came to him like an inspiration that it would be a fine thing to keep a school. He talked with his sister, and she thought it a good plan, and gave him the use of one of her parlors in which to teach the school. The carpenter came, and soon fixed up the room so that it looked like a real school-room.

A Bunch of Roses.

The Chautauqua Literary and Social Circle hav been wrestling with "The Rose"—each member being requested to furnish a sentence containing the word "rose." I like to help the young folks, so I sent in a whole bouquet of roses, and here they are.

There are various families of roses. For instance, natural, artificial, and otherwise.

No one would suspect any relationship between Rose Early and Early Rose until they saw Rose Early at the table and Early Rose on the table. The relationship would then be seen to be of the most intim*ate* kind.

Then, Early Rose is such an improvement on the rose of Erin that Paddy would scarcely know it from a potato entirely.

The primrose; why, that's a nice old maid, because nice old maids are always prim—probably the spelling should be prime.

Rose rash is when Rose refuses the offer of a *nose*gay, painted rose color, and resembling an over-ripe strawberry.

I knew a man that painted his nose rose trying to find the bottom of a tube rose. He succeeded.

Rose marines are sailors detailed to take care of all young ladies named Rose, when they cross the equator in canoes—the same as horse marines take care of the horses when sailing along the Milky Way.

He*rose* are girls that can get up and build the fire in the morning when the mercury is below zero. Then, while John Frost paints roses of health on their cheeks, a dam-ask rose may be seen issuing from between their rosebud lips.

Some fishes hav rows of teeth that you wouldn't like to dally with of a summer evening.

Johnny Rose sat on rows of tacks in a chair; he then arose with a *yell*ow rose beneath his nose, and now, I suppose, he knows something about the rose—thorns.

An ancient maiden lady once prayed, in faith believing, and with all the ardor of her enthusiastic nature, "I request, Father Time, my sweet roses you'll spare." But Father Time heeded not her supplications, so earnestly, beautifully, and sweetly expressed, any more than any other god that the fertil imagination of man has invented has heeded the prayers and entreaties of men. Father Time touched her roses with his frosty wand, and they withered and faded as all roses do.

And that prayer business—why, that's a moss rose, invented by an old mossback, from away back, to dupe and deceive the unwary and unsuspecting.

My papa takes it; he has taken it only about two months. This is my first letter. I wish very much to see it in print. Yours truly,

EMERSON ASHCRAFT (aged twelve).

MONTESANO, WASH., April 6, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a few lines, as I hav never seen a letter to the Children's Corner from this place. This is my first attempt to write a letter. I am going to school here now. I hav not lived here quite a year. Pa and ma are both Infidels and take THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am studying reading, spelling, arithmetic, language, and physiology. I hav a good teacher.

You will please find inclosed thirty cents for Mr. Hacker. Respectfully yours,

AMSTERDAM, N. Y., April 5, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav often wanted to write to you. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we read the Children's Corner every week. I hav five brothers and three sisters younger than I am. I am fifteen. Two brothers and two sisters besides myself go to school every day. We hav a good school. The trustees of our district do not allow the Bible read in school hours. My father and mother want us to think for ourselvs, and not depend on what the ministers and the Bible say altogether.

Yours truly, LEONARD GRISWOLD.

HIGHLAND HOME, CAL., April 2, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is the first letter I hav written to the Corner. I hope I shall see it in print as well as the rest of the letters. We liv in the Santa Cruz mountains on a little fruit farm. My brother and sister go to school, and I would if I was well enough. I hav been sick for six weeks. The teacher's name is Mr. Marsh. I hav three little brothers that stay at home; one is the baby, and the other is almost three, and the other four. I would like to go to school if I was well enough. We hav two horses, and one dog, and one cat. I like to read the Children's Corner. This being the first letter, I will quit writing. Your little friend,

JESSIE MAY RODGERS (aged nine).

CROMWELL, IA., April 3, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Here I am again, a Liberal and a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I see a letter from Carrie A. Truman, Nevinville, Iowa; she and I are well acquainted. I am going to see her before long. I was away on a visit to La Porte city to see my grandpa and grandma; it was their golden wedding celebration. My brother George sent to Otto Wettstein for a silver watch, and upon receiving it was very well pleased. He says he will purchase all such things of him. My mamma is going to get a set of silver knives and forks there. I would recommend every Liberal to patronize him.

P.S.—Anyone wishing to exchange flower seeds adapted to this climate, please address,

GRINNELL, IA., April 20, 1888.

EDITOR CHILDREN'S CORNER: It is now two months since I returned from a business trip to the Argentine republic. No doubt, all the children that can read our bible, THE TRUTH SEEKER, know in what part of the world this sunny, but priest-ridden, country is. To tell you that I was glad to get home after a five months' sojourn there is but feebly expressing my feelings. Ever since my return I hav been thinking that I ought to write sketches of my travels to the Corner, and try and tell the little folks what I saw, heard, and felt, but a fear that I was by education unfitted to do so caused me to desist. But, if our lady, the editress of the Corner, wishes it, I shall try and do the best I can—especially if she will promis to correct my blunders and mistakes, for I am not used to writing for the press. I am a mechanic, and hav had to work hard all my life, and so had little available time to acquire an education. I hav read THE TRUTH SEEKER more than six years and been a subscriber over five, and so hav gathered quite a little fund of knowledge from the many great and able contributors that write for its pages. I hav three children that read the letters in the Corner, as well as the remarkably fine scientific essays so ably written by Miss Wixon; also, the bad "Badger Boy" is eagerly read, and many a hearty laugh is indulged in. I shall not make my first letter very long. If it is thought best that I write a few letters descriptiv of my rambles in South America, I will do so, but knowing that space is scarce in the Corner, I shall await the opinion of the one who so ably manages it. Courteously yours,

W. T. LEINS.

[We shall all be delighted if our kind friend will write some sketches for the Corner, descriptiv of what he has seen and heard in his travels in the Argentine republic. We thank him cordially for his thoughtful interest, and trust ever to deserve his praise and patronage.—ED. C. C.]

Startling Transformation.

A very small boy, who had hitherto only seen his little baby cousin crawling about the floor, on entering her home, very unexpectedly, found her moving around on her feet. "O mother!" he exclaimed, "she's walking on her hind legs."

A Sad State of Things.

There livs in Leominster, on Central street, a rather nervous four-year-old girl, who could never sleep unless the room was dimly lighted. One night recently the lamp became extinguished, and she called loudly for her mother, who asked what was the matter. She said between sobs: "The light is out, and I can't see whether my eyes are open or not."

The Naughty Boy's Penitence.

A little boy had been extremely naughty at dinner, and had been sent away from the table just as his favorit dessert—cabinet pudding, with butter and sugar sauce—was being served. About 9 o'clock that evening, when the other children had gone to bed and his parents were alone in the sitting-room, a tear-stained little face and a white-robed figure appeared at the door. "Mamma," it said, bravely, between sobs, "you told me never to go to sleep when anything wrong had been done until it was all fixed up right, so I came down to tell you that—that—that—I—forgiv you and papa for what you did to me at the dinner-table."

The Whistling-Tree.

In Nubia there are groves of acacia extending over one hundred miles square. "The most conspicuous species," says Dr. Schweinfurth, "is the acacia fistula. Its Arabic name is soffar, meaning flute or pipe. From the larvæ of insects which hav worked their way into the inside their ivory-white shoots are often distorted in form and swollen out at their base into globular, bladder-like balls about one inch in diameter. After the insect has emerged from a circular hole, this thorn-like shoot becomes a sort of musical instrument upon which the wind as it plays produces the regular sound of a flute. On this account the nativs of the Soudan name the acacia the whistling-tree."—The Coronado.

FROM A GIRL'S COMPOSITION.—Boys is men that hav not got as big as their papas, and girls is young women that will be young ladies by and by. . . . Man was made before woman. When God looked at Adam he said to himself, "Well, I guess I can do better than that if I try again," and then he made Eve. God liked Eve so much better than he did Adam that there has been more women in the world than men ever since. . . . Boys are a trouble. They are very wearing on everything but soap. . . . If I could hav my way, half the boys in the world would be little girls, and the other half would be dolls.—Boston Herald.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectively and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

Poetry.

The Ninkum Land.

From the Florida Alligator.

A thingamajig met a thingamaree
One day in the land where the ninkums be;
And the thingamajig, with a swaggering air,
Gave the thingamaree a well-bred stare;
And the ninkums all gathered around to see
The thingamajig meet the thingamaree.

"Your hands are horny, your clothes are old
And tattered and torn, and I'm even told
That you work for hire! that I can't forgiv;
On my coupons and bonds and rents I liv.
You fellow, how dare you look at me?"
Said the thingamajig to the thingamaree.

Then the 'ree got down on his marrow-bones,
And he abjectly kissed the dusty stones
Where the 'jig had stood, like a slavish thing
Who bows in awe of a tyrant king;
And the ninkums all laughed and jeered to see
The craven looks of the thingamaree.

"We all must work for our daily bread;
Those who will not work may not eat," they said;
"And whether a man, from pride or shame,
Would shrink his duties, we equal blame;
And no greater difference can we see
'Twixt a thingamajig and a thingamaree
Than 'twixt tweedledum and tweedledee."

'Twas a long time ago in a distant land,
Where ninkums lived, you will understand.
We manage things better here, and to-day
Those who work the least get the biggest pay;
And the ninkums are those who the work must do,
Who must toil and slave, and go hungry, too.
And we neither wonder nor laugh to see
A thingamajig or a thingamaree.

That Badger Boy At Sunday-School.

THE LESSON OF JOSEPH, SANS MRS. POTIPHAR'S ESSAY.

It is to be regretted that there is so much in the Bible that will bear omission in reading "before folks," except in hardshell circles, as that which can be omitted in the interest of nativ modesty and purity is very often the most entertaining and piquant portion of the aggregation of fables that are at once the wildest, weirdest, wickedest, most wonderful, startling, thrilling, shocking, ludicrous, and bizarre tales that ever emanated from the imaginativ gray matter ensconced in the head of man; but so it is, and it can't be helped, as I see.

The teacher had read the remarkable story of Joseph's life, barring the episode with Mrs. Potiphar, which would require explanations of a delicate nature, if read before very young people, and which the teacher preferred not to make, and that boy James was at the fore with his double-back-action pump, as was his wont.

"Well, I don't care, now; I don't think it's the cheese for a pop to take ever so much more stock into one of his kids than the others, do you, mum?"

"Frankly, James, I don't. I agree with you there." (This was a bald-headed bid for taffy, and no doubt she would get it before the séance ended.) "If one of the kids—dear me, the boys—was ever, ever, so much nicer than——"

"Huh! that Joe warn't. He was a chump, and peached on his brothers. I'm down on a fellow that'll peach. But what a guy he must a been, mum, in that coat of many colors, mustn't he, mum?"

"It must hav been a queer-looking coat, James, I think."

"But his brothers got square when they got him into the hole, didn't they, mum?"

"Don't talk like that, James. It was very wicked of them."

"It was kinder mean, mum; a whole lot of 'em onto one. What was them twenty pieces of silver, mum—dimes, quarters, halves, or dollars?"

"I don't know, James."

"If 'twas dollars, 'twasn't much for a grown-up young feller, was it, mum? Wouldn't you giv more'n that for a nice young feller, mum?"

"James—how you do talk!"

"I'll bet you would, mum!"

"James Badger, you stop, now!"

"Yes'm. But you wouldn't hav to, mum, 'cos you're so pooty, and your teeth shine so." (O taffy, taffy, how grateful to the yearning female heart thou art!)

"Thank you, James. Your lips speak for your eyes, I suppose."

"Yes'm. What did old Potifer jug Joe for, mum?"

"Mrs. Potiphar got vexed at him, and told stories about him, my dear."

"P'r'aps she wanted to mash Joe and he wouldn't hav it, mum." (How strange that the boy should drop like a plummet to the very bottom of the well where truth lay hidden!) "If the Super should want to mash you, mum——"

"James Badger, now you stop this very instant! I won't permit you to talk so."

"No'm. Was Faro the sharp that the card game was named after, mum?"

"It isn't at all likely, you dreadful boy, you! But I know nothing of wicked card games, and you had ought to be ashamed for asking me."

"Yes'm. Did Joe hav a dream-book, mum? Ma's got one—hav you? Pop says all old maids——"

"You James Madison Badger—you horrid little monkey, you—you go right straight home!"

"No'm—don't, please. Pop says all old maids don't hav dream-books, only the homely ones, mum. Course you hain't got one, 'cos yer handsome" (mentally: "So is a hen"). "But Joe was a corker for tellin' dreams, wasn't he, mum?"

"You little slang-bag, God told him what the dreams meant."

"Does God hav a dream-book, mum?"

"Now, you James Badger, you go home!"

"No'm—please. Does God tell folks what dreams mean now, mum?"

"No, he does not."

"'Cos I had a dream t'other night that I was ridin' on a white hoss lickety-split, and all to once was on a neagle way up in the air over the houses, and a ship come up and the cap'n said that was his eagle, and I said, It's your'n if you can ketch him, and giv the eagle a cut with the whip, and the fust thing I knowed I was way up to my neck in a nawful big chicken pie, and had to eat all the crust to get out, but I liked it bully, and then I waked up, mum. D'yer 'spose God could tell what that dream meant, mum?"

"Of course he could, if he wanted to."

"Yes'm. Do fellers look round to see a white hoss, mum, when they see your hair? I guess they don't, 'cos it's obbun, ain't it, mum?"

"Yes, it is auburn" (snapped out viciously).

"Some of them old Patricks in Egypt, mum——"

"Patricks! patriarchs, you monkey, you."

"Yes'm. Some o' them old snoozers had five or six wives, didn't they, mum? Pop says they was regular old Mormons."

"Shut up, you boy!"

"Yes'm. Would you like to been one o' Methusalem's wives when he was nine hundred and ninety-nine years old, mum?"

"Shut up and go home, you outrageous little wretch!"

"Yes'm. I'll bet if you'd been in Egypt King Faro would made you queen, mum! Wouldn't you look bully with a gold crown on?—you bet!" (This hot soft solder melted asperity as with a fervent heat.)

"Do you think so, James?"

"Yes'm" (mental reservation: "In a horn"). "Was old Jake a Sheeny tailor, mum?"

"What are you talking about, boy?"

"Didn't he make that coat of many colors for Joe?"

"Oh—yes; but Jacob wasn't a tailor, dear! He raised flocks and herds."

"Would you walk down Main street with the duffer in that crazy-quilt coat, mum?"

"James Badger, you'll drive me crazy!"

"No'm. Did Faro eat lots of mince pie, mum, that made him dream so?"

"James Badger, you are too ridiculous to liv."

"Yes'm. Joe had a soft snap when he got the bulge on Faro, didn't he, mum?"

"Oh, you slangy little wretch, do go home!"

"No'm—it's fun here. Why don't you go where them Mormon Patricks is that has nine and ten wives apiece, mum, 'cos you might ketch onto——"

"There, you little abomination, you—you go right straight home this minute! I won't put up with you any longer! The class is dismissed." And the séance according to Joseph broke up very suddenly.

SI SLOKUM.

Obituary.

DIED, on Saturday, March 24th, of pneumonia fever, Thos. Allen, a farmer, living near Bethany, Mo.

He was born on Jan. 7, 1822, near Winchester, Va., being sixty-six years old. His parents were Quakers, who moved from Virginia to Belmont, O., when he was a boy, and from there to Jackson county, O.

He settled in Harrison county, Mo., in 1859, where he resided at the time of his death. He met death calmly and philosophically. He had been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for ten or twelve years, and was a great admirer of D. M. Bennett. He was an earnest advocate of Liberalism, and did what he could to advance Freethought.

His nature was of the fearless and outspoken kind, and seemed to care very little for the church's hatred or its ostracizing spirit.

The Society of Infidels of this section hav lost a respected brother and a worker in the cause of universal mental liberty. May he rest in peace. WM. H. ALLEN.

Bethany, Mo.

Formally Married.

From the Omaha Bee.

A newly elected justice of the peace, who had been used to drawing up deeds and wills, and little else, was called upon to marry a couple in haste. Removing his hat, he remarked: "Hats off in the presence of the court." All being uncovered, he proceeded: "Hold up yer right hand. You, John Mankin, do yer solemnly swear to the best of yer knowledge an' belief, that yer take this woman to hav an' to hold for yerself, yer heirs, execyrters, administraters, and assigns, for yer and thir use forever?"

"I do," answered the groom, promptly.

"You, Alice Evans, take this year man for yer husband, ter hav and ter hold forever; an' you do solemnly swear that yer lawfully seized in fee simple an' free from all incumbrance, an' hav good right to sell, bargain, an' convey to said grantee, yerself, yer heirs, administrators, an' assigns?"

"I—I do," said the bride, doubtfully.

"Well, that 'er's worth a dollar 'n fifty cents."

"Are we married?" asked the bride.

"Yes. Know all men by these presents, that I, being in good health and of sound mind and disposition, in consideration of a dollar 'n fifty cents to me in hand well an' truly paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do, an' by these presents, hav declared you man an' wife durin' good behavior, an' until otherwise ordered by the court."

The Jesuit Maxim.

From the Lutheran Observer.

An interesting controversy has been going on for some time between Bishop Arthur Cleveland Coxe and some Jesuit writers in regard to the authenticity of the famous Jesuit maxim, "The end justifies the means."

The following note of Bishop Coxe in the Churchman explains the origin of the controversy:

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE CHURCHMAN: A little more than a year since, I had occasion to quote the Jesuit maxim, 'The end justifies the means.' To answer it, one of the Jesuit fathers in this city inserted the following bravado in one of our local journals of largest circulation:

"'If Bishop Coxe can show from the authentic works of any one of the thousand authors of the Society of Jesus that the Jesuits teach the principle that the end justifies the means, he shall receive the reward of $1,000, payable at Canisius College of this city.'

"This was immediately answered by me, declining the reward, unless they were willing to send it to one of our benevolent institutions, but referring him for proof to the Encyclopedia Britannica, Vol. XIII, p. 651, where are to be found textual quotations from three Jesuit writers (Busenbaum, Layman, and Wagemann) fully meeting the challenge. The article quotes from one of them as follows: 'Finis determinat probitatem actus.' This met the bravado effectually; but, needless to say, the reward was never paid. The Jesuits contented themselvs with replying that this maxim does not mean that 'the end justifies bad means.' (Answer: Good means require no justification.) I had accepted their challenge and given a responsible reference, to which everybody has access. It would be easy to giv other data; but who can bind Proteus? Enough; it illustrates their maxim that they now circulate through the newspaper statements that 'the bishop had never met their challenge.' I write this only to gratify friends who hav inquired of me as to the facts. A. CLEVELAND COXE,
"Bishop of western New York."

Bishop Coxe has also cited other Jesuit authorities in the Independent to establish the Jesuit origin of the maxim; but Catholic writers object to this testimony, because they maintain that the authors cited did not mean that the maxim should be applied in general, but only to the particular cases employed as illustrations. One was that of a murderer sentenced to death who escapes from prison, and may thereby bring serious injury upon his jailers. The question is, Has the murderer done wrong in escaping? The answer of the Jesuit Father Voit, in his Moral Theology, is: "He has done no wrong—cui enim licit finis ei et mediaper missa sunt" (For to whom the end is lawful, the means to it are also permitted).

Another case cited is that of a man who stole, and gave what he stole to some charity. The question is: Has he done wrong? The Jesuit answer is: "Finis determinat probitatem actus" (The end determins the probity of an act).

Now, although the cases cited are particular ones which the Jesuit theologians employed as illustrations of their maxim, they are yet of such a character as to serve also as general illustrations of the maxim that if an end was lawful or allowable, the means to attain it were also lawful or allowable. If the maxim applies to a murderer who, in order to escape punishment, brings the lives of his jailers into danger, and if it applies to a thief who givs alms out of what he has stolen, it is quite evident that it has a pretty wide application to malefactors in general, and we think it more than probable that the Jesuit authors of it intended its application should be general. The objection of Catholic writers, therefore, that the application of the maxim should be limited to the cases employed as illustrations by its authors is not valid, and has in it the viciousness of the maxim itself, and the dialectic evasivness which has ever been a marked characteristic of Jesuit morals and practice.

For example: It is a good end to prevent the exposure of the vicious principles of the Jesuits; therefore the use of evasiv and tricky means of defense are lawful. "The end justifies the means." Quod erat demonstrandum.

They Made Joseph Cook Angry.

From the Chicago Herald.

A party of half a dozen or more oil men from Cleveland, New York, and elsewhere were celebrating at a room in the Michigan Exchange, Detroit, last week, the consummation of a big oil deal and the prospectiv completion of other big deals. The celebration consisted of the rendering, with the aid of an occasional glass of mild malt liquor, of sundry recitations by different members of the party. Among the selections given by a talented amateur elocutionist in the company, about 12:15 A.M., was a rather profane, but very patriotic, parody on the Lord's Prayer entitled, "The Soldier's Prayer." He got about halfway through it, when a highly indignant protest at the excessiv noise, and still more excessiv profanity, was heard from the occupant of an adjoining room, into which a door, secured by a lock on each side, opened. The jolly party forthwith unlocked their side of the door, and extended a cordial welcome to the stranger to join the company and hav some beer. "Come in and we'll hav some fun with you," was the hospitable remark made by one of the oleaginous party. In clear, distinct, and still more indignant tones came this cheerful remark from the other chamber, "You go to where the brimstone burns." The stranger, who was a gentleman of striking appearance and large physique, immediately dressed and went down to the hotel office exceedingly wroth. The situation was explained to him, and he was offered another room, but he gathered his gripsacks about him and insisted on leaving the hotel and seeking other quarters. "Maybe you never heard of me," he said, angrily, to the hotel-clerk, as he was going out. "I am the Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, the lecturer." The celebrated lecturer had come in on an evening train from Toronto. The oil men continued the celebration, expressing confidence in their ability to "desulphurize" brimstone.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

SHE stood by the open window, and, as the old man came into the room, with a finger on her lips she bade him hush. Then, as the last notes of a lawn-mower in the adjoining yard died away, she turned with a look of rapture on her face. "Ah, papa," she said, "isn't Wagner simply exquisit?"

COLONEL FITZSMITHERS, the editor of the Kentucky Greased Lightning, and a member of one of our most prominent families, was baptized and received into the Second Baptist church, last Sunday, under most auspicious circumstances. The colonel and the Rev. Mr. Horntooter had just descended into the water preparatory to immersion, and the minister was repeating those solemn words which begin, "Brother, dost thou promis to renounce the world, the flesh, and the devil?" when the colonel, raising his eyes in rapt devotion, happened to espy on the bank above the familiar form of Major Blatherskite, the editor of the Derringer. Now, these two gentlemen had had a political discussion, during which the major had published in the columns of the Derringer some rather caustic truths in regard to the colonel. This affair had never been satisfactorily arranged, so that when the colonel observed the major, he leaned over until he could catch the ear of the minister without being noticed, and whispered: "Go right along with the sarvice, parson. Don't let any of them critters suspect I'm a-talkin' to you, but I'd be obliged if you could giv me the loan of your shootin'-iron for a moment, as I left mine on the bank." The minister, taking in the situation at a glance, managed to slip his six-shooter into the colonel's hand without being seen by the crowd, and then, by a quick movement, he gained the bank, and the firing began. After three or four shots had been exchanged, with no other result than killing a negro, who was standing on the opposit bank, the colonel happened to get the drop on the major while he was trying to escape, and thus ended the dispute. After this little incident, the minister once more descended into the water, and the ceremony was concluded. Before the assemblage dispersed, however, the major and the negro were buried, and the colonel in a few touching words extolled the virtues of baptism, saying that its effects were to abolish all feelings of violence, and to teach that beautiful precept, "Love thy neighbor as thyself!"—Life.

Gems of Thought.

VIRTUE is a subordination of the passions to the intellect. It is to act in accordance with your highest convictions. It does not consist in believing, but in doing. This is the sublime truth that the Infidels in all ages hav uttered. They hav handed the torch from one to the other through all the years that hav fled. Upon the altar of reason they hav kept the sacred fire, and through the long midnight of faith they fed the divine flame.—Ingersoll.

A MAN who fancies that he can dictate a complete system of religion to the world only shows that he is arrogant to the verge of insanity. Some little may be done by any honest thinker—by anyone who really aims at advancing inquiry, instead of trying to throw dust in people's eyes. He may help, according to the measure of his powers, to stimulate the impulses which are on the side of Freethought, and which are the best guarantee for a healthy instead of a morbid development. It is not merely the right, but the duty, of everyone competent to the task to do what in him lies to strengthen the fitful and uncertain influence of a sound intellect upon the vast and intricate jumble of conflicting opinions in the world at large.—Leslie Stephen.

MRS. GENERAL had no opinions. Her way of forming a mind was to prevent it from forming opinions. She had a little circular set of mental grooves or rails on which she started little trains of other people's opinions, which never overtook one another and never got anywhere. Even her propriety could not dispute that there was impropriety in the world; but Mrs. General's way was to put it out of sight and make believe that there was no such thing. This was another of her ways of forming a mind—to cram all articles of difficulty into cupboards, lock them up, and say they had no existence. It was the easiest way and the properest.—Dickens's Little Dorrit.

IT was finely said by Socrates that the shortest and most direct road to popularity is "for a man to be the same that he wishes to be taken for." People are egregiously mistaken if they think they ever can attain to permanent popularity by hypocrisy, by mere outside appearances, and by disguising not only their language but their looks. True popularity takes deep root and spreads itself wide; but the false falls away like blossoms; for nothing that is false can be lasting.—Cicero.

THAT venerable structure, the Egyptian constitution, had been raised by no human hands. As the gods had appointed certain animals to swim in the water, and others to fly in the air, and others to move upon the earth, so they had decreed that one man should be a priest, and that another should be a soldier, and that another should till the ground. There are times when every man feels discontented with his lot. But it is evident that if men were able to change their occupations whenever they chose, there would be a continual passing to and fro. Nobody would hav patience to learn a trade; nobody would settle down in life. In a short time the land would become a desert, and society would be dissolved. To provide against this the gods had ordained that each man should do his duty in that state of life into which he had been called; and woe be to him that disobeys the gods! Their laws are eternal and can never change; their vengeance is speedy and can never fail.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

THE food of hope
Is meditated action; robbed of this,
Her sole support, she languishes and dies.
We perish also; for we liv by hope
And by desire; we see by the glad light,
And breathe the sweet air of futurity,
And so we liv, or else we hav no life.
—Wordsworth.

I CANNOT call riches better than the baggage of virtue. The Roman word is better, "impedimenta" [things that entangle the feet]; for as the baggage is to an army, so is riches to virtue: it cannot be spared nor left behind, but it hindereth the march; yea, and the care of it sometimes loseth or disturbeth the victory. Of great riches there is no real use except it be in the distribution; the rest is but conceit; so saith Solomon, "Where much is, there are many to consume it; and what hath the owner but the sight of it with his eyes?"—Bacon's Essays.

EXTOL not riches, then—the toil of fools,
The wise man's cumbrance, if not snare—more apt
To slacken virtue and abate her edge
Than prompt her to do aught may merit praise.
—Milton.

WHATEVER it is right to do on any other day of the week, it is right to do on the first day of the week, whether you call it by the heathen name of Sunday or the Jewish name of Sabbath. Morality is in no sense subserved or promoted by "keeping" the pharisaical, puritanical, Scotch, long-faced Sabbath.—D. M. Bennett.

WHEN one thinks of the real agony one has gone through in consequence of false teaching, it makes human nature angry with the teachers who hav added to the bitterness of life.—General Gordon.

THE CRY OF COLLARED CHRISTIANS.—"DON'T HURT OUR FEELINGS."

Notes and Clippings.

Two thousand foreign Jews in Odessa hav received notice to quit within one week.

DAMON Y. GILGON, the lawyer and woman's rights advocate, died in Philadelphia last week, aged sixty-one years.

MR. ISAAC PITMAN, the "father of shorthand writing," is now seventy years old. He is almost an ascetic, using no wine, beer, spirits, tobacco, nor animal food of any kind. In religion he is an earnest Swedenborgian.

THE Church Association has protested to the bishop of London against the erection of the new reredos for St. Paul's cathedral. A crucifix and image of the madonna are denounced as "lying images," and their worship as "distinctly Romish."

HERBERT SPENCER is in much better health now, although he is still restrained from the labor of writing. He is able to work three hours a day, and dictates everything to a secretary. His favorit recreation is billiards, and this game has been a source of great benefit to him by its gentle exercise and entertainment.

A CURIOUS case of citizenship is to be decided by the Iowa courts. In one of the towns of the state a Methodist minister appeared as prosecuting witness against a saloonkeeper. At the next election the saloonkeeper challenged the vote of the clergyman on the ground that he was an itinerant Methodist preacher, and, being subject at any time to removal by the bishop of the Methodist Episcopal church, could not, therefore, be a citizen of any town, county, or state. The judges of election overruled the challenge, but the plaintiff has carried the case to the supreme court of the state, and it comes on in the May term.

THE World says: "Recently the correspondence between the Rev. Henry M. Field and Colonel Ingersoll was being discussed in the presence of the late Roscoe Conkling. Somebody asked the famous lawyer whether he believed in the existence of heaven. 'If there is any place,' Mr. Conkling is said to hav answered, 'where politics never was and never could be heard of, it would deserve that name.'"

THE Rev. Dr. Joseph Parker, the London clergyman who was overcome by the vastness of this country, has given $25 to the fund for purchasing an annuity for George Jacob Holyoake, the English reformer. Dr. Parker's generosity is due to the fact that, as he says, whenever Mr. Holyoake has seen a newspaper paragraph favorably referring to Mr. Parker's ministry he has cut it out and sent it to him.

THE Rev. Dr. E. E. Murray doesn't believe in the church fair, and in the last Presbyterian Quarterly says so at length, giving reasons for his unbelief. "It seems strange," he says, "that those who would think it beneath them to turn peddlers, restaurant keepers, etc., yet think they are honoring the church in thus degrading her. What a state our poor church must be in when she is forced to take to selling oysters and ice cream for a living! What minister with an atom of self-respect would tolerate a proposal to raise his salary in such a way? With all our dime readings, ice cream festivals, oyster suppers, concerts, etc., every one of the benevolent causes of the church is languishing for the want of a proper support."

THE Sun is authority for this: Mr. Gladstone received an honorarium of one hundred guineas for the manuscript of the last brief essay with which he favored an American magazine. The Sage of Hawarden has got higher pay from several American periodicals than they ever gave to any other writer. A few days ago the editor of a monthly arsenal of brains made him an offer which overtops anything yet sent to him. "It is not for his thought," the editor said, in explanation, "but for his name."

AT the banquet in celebration of General Grant's birthday at Delmonico's on the 27th ult., Colonel Ingersoll made a brief speech. He said: "I firmly believe that any nation great enough to produce and appreciate a great and splendid man is great enough to keep his memory green. No man admires Grant and the men who fought under him more than I do, not because they walked to the cannon's mouth, but because they fought for the greatest cause that can be expressed in the English language, the cause of human liberty. And as I listened to General Malone to-night I felt that the North was just as responsible for the war as the South. The South upheld slavery, but so did the North. I find greater excuse for the Southerner who lived on the labor of the slave than for the Northerner who was to hav half the profits of that labor and none of the disgrace. When we consider the matter philosophically, the North was as responsible as the South. So I say, when I remember that here in New York men were mobbed for advocating the abolition of slavery, I can't find it in my heart to lay all the blame on the South. If the war was for conquest, for aggrandizement, I should not feel like placing Grant alongside of the great commanders of history, but when I remember that every blow broke a chain, that the white man was to be civilized at the same time the black man was freed, and that the flag was to be left without a stain on it, I feel like placing him at the head of all the commanders of the world. I do not believe a more merciful man ever drew a sword. All greatness is mercy. All truly great men love to forgiv. All greatly heroic natures are capable of shedding the divine tear of pity. I say, moreover, that the man who is defeated and who sees his error and acknowledges it is a victor, and I say it understandingly that the South is to-day as much a victor as the North. I know the names of Grant's victories and they shine like stars in the heaven of his fame. I admire great and dramatic achievements on the field of war. But the grandest of all his acts was when, on his dying bed, he directed that his body should be laid in no spot where his wife could not lie side by side with him. When General Grant went to England and sat down with her majesty's ministers he conferred an honor upon them. I want to see one change in our diplomatic service. I want to see precedence given at Washington to the representativs of republics. Let us hav some backbone ourselvs. Let ministers of monarchies be No. 2. Let embassadors of despots come the next day. We are at least a civilized people, and upon the pages of our history are to be found names as glorious as those of any land and any age."

Sex in Brain.

The political conditions of woman are very greatly influenced to-day by what is taught to her and about her by those two conservativ molders of public opinion, clergymen and physicians.

Our lawmakers hav long since ceased to merely sneer at the simple claim of human rights by one-half of humanity, and for refuge they hav flown to priest and practitioner, who do not fail them in this their hour of great tribulation.

It is true that men, most of whom never enter a church, hav grown somewhat ashamed to press the theological arguments against the equality of the sexes, and to these men the medical argument has become an ever present help in their time of trouble.

In the early days woman was under the absolute sway of club and fist. Then came censer and gown, swinging hell in the perfumed depths of the one, and hiding in the folds of the other thumbscrew and fagot for the woman who dared to think.

At last the theory of the primal curse upon her head has grown weaker. Mankind struggles to be less brutal and more just. Manly men are beginning to blush when they hear repeated the well-worn fable of the fall of man through woman's crime, and her inferiority of position and opportunity justified by priest and pleader because of legends inherited from barbarians—mental deformities worthy of their parentage.

When religious influence and dogma began to close their terrors, legal enactments were slowly modified in woman's favor as hell went out of fashion. Then conservatism, ignorance, and egotism, in dismay and terror, took counsel together and called in medical science, still in its infancy, to aid in staying the march of progress which is inevitable to civilization, and so necessary to anything like a real republic.

Equality of opportunity began to be denied to woman for the first time upon natural and so-called scientific grounds. She was pronounced physically and mentally incapable because of certain anatomical conditions, and she must be prevented, for her own good and that of the race here—from competition with her mental and physical superiors.

It was no longer her soul, but her body, that needed saving from herself. Her thirst for knowledge, the clergy declared, had already damned the souls of a very large majority of mankind—in a hereafter known only to them.

The same vicious tendency, the doctors echoed, will be the ruin of the physical bodies of the race in this world, as we are prepared to prove. The case began to look hopeless again.

Opportunity must be denied, these doctors say, because capacity does not exist. Where capacity seems to exist, it is, it must be, at the expense of individual health and future maternal capabilities.

As a person she has no status with these consistent believers in "equal rights to all mankind."

As a potential mother only can she hope for consideration either by religious or medical theorist.

This has been a difficult combination to meet. Few who cared to contest their verdict possessed the bravery to fearlessly face the religious dictators, and fewer still had the anatomical and anthropological information to risk a fight on a field which assumed to be held by those who based all of their arguments upon scientific facts, collected by microscope and scales, and reduced to unanswerable statistics.

The priest, reinforced by the doctor, promised a long and bitter struggle on new grounds to those who fought for simple justice to the individual, aside from her sex relations, who wished for neither malediction nor mercy, claiming only the right of a unit to enjoy the common heritage untrammeled by superstition and artificial difficulties.

They do not ask to be helped—only not to be hindered. They had hailed science as their friend, an ally, and behold, pseudo-science adopted theories, invented statistics, and published personal prejudice as demonstrated fact. All this has done a vast deal of harm.

Educators, theorists, and politicians readily accept the data and statistics of prominent physicians, and, in good faith, make it a basis of action, while the victims of their misinformation hav been helpless.

It is, therefore, very important to learn, if possible, just how far medical science and anthropology hav really discovered demonstrable natural sex differences in the brains of men and women, and how far the usual theories advanced are gratuitous assumptions founded upon legend, and fed by mental habit and personal egotism.

I began an investigation into this matter a little while ago by questioning the arguments and logic of the medical pseudo-scientists from their own basis of facts. I ended by questioning the facts themselvs, upon the evidence furnished me by leading members of the profession, some of whom are known in this country and abroad as leaders in original investigation as brain students and anatomists.

None of these gentlemen knew the aim or motiv of my inquiries, and they gave me all the information to be had on this subject without bias, and quite freely. The specialists and brain students to whom my questions were submitted were of widely different religious beliefs, which, of course, colored their theories as well as their motivs, either consciously or unconsciously.

But the profession has reason to be proud of the ability of most of these men, no less than of their sincerity or willingness to confess to ignorance of facts where proof was lacking. The abler the man the more willing was he to do this.

One or two tried to explain, and, as it seemed to me, to force an agreement between scientific facts which they did possess and their inherited belief in "revelation."

Others, who did not themselvs recognize it, performed the same mental gymnastics from mere force of habit, and gave a black eye to their facts in preserving a blind eye to their faith.

But in the following results are to be found the opinions of eminent medical men, some of whom are Roman Catholic, some Protestant, and some of the negativ systems of religion. So far as I know, not one is a believer in woman suffrage, or even in the more radical measures for her development.

Not one who touched directly upon the subject believed in sex equality in its entirety, or had not personal prejudice and long-cherished sentiments opposed to it, if their reason approved.

By some of them this was frankly stated, even while giving facts in woman's favor. Not more than one, so far as I know, is Agnostic in religion or a believer in evolution in its entirety.

I hav mentioned these latter points, because I found in this line of investigation, as in all others, that a man's religious leanings inevitably color and modify all of his opinions, and govern his entire mental outlook. They even get into his "jalap" and fizz in his "seltzer." If he absolutely believe in the "Garden of Eden" story, he deals with "Adam" as a creature after "God's own heart and in his image," and therefore capable and deserving of all opportunity and development for and because of himself, and to promote his own happiness.

"Eve," of course, receives due attention as a physical, anatomical specimen, "with intuitions"—a mere bone or rib of contention, as it were, between man and man.

The more orthodox the man the bonier the rib. The more literal and consistent his faith the less likely is he to deal with woman as an intellectual being, capable of and entitled to the same, or as liberal, mental, social, and financial opportunities or rights as are universally conceded to be the birthright of all men, and quite beyond further controversy in their case.

Evidence in her favor must be overwhelming indeed, then, which cannot be evaded if an investigator starts out handicapped with the theory of "revelation" as a part of his mental equipment, and with the "sphere of woman" formulated for him by the ancient Hebrews.

I went to the men whom the doctors themselvs told me were the best authority to be found on the subject in hand.

One of these men was referred to by physicians of all schools of practice as undoubtedly the best-informed man in America, and second to none in the world in this branch of the profession. They one and all told me that what he could not tell me himself, or could not tell me where to find, on this subject could not be of the slightest importance.

I hav been asked to tell you just what I started out to learn, and how far I succeeded.

But before I do this it may not be out of place to tell you an anecdote of my experience in this undertaking. I went personally to about twenty of the leading physicians of New York with my questions.

Nearly every one of these, after very kindly telling me what he himself knew and what he believed on the subject, referred me to the same man as the final appeal; but not one of them was willing to introduce me to him.

They would introduce me to anybody and everybody else, but they did not like to risk sending me to him. He was, they said, utterly impatient of ignorance, and might treat me with scant courtesy.

He would very kindly tell me flatly that he could not waste time on so trivial a matter—that I and everybody else ought to know all about "Sex in brain."

Now, this is a secret—I would not hav it get out for a good deal—it took me a good while to get my courage up to go to that man without an introduction, a thing I did not do with any of the others. I finally, with fear and trembling, made up my mind to learn what he knew on this subject or perish in the attempt.

So I took my life in my hands, put on my best gown—I had previously discovered that even brain anatomists are subject to the spell of good clothes—and went!

I fully expected to be reduced to mere pulp before I left; but he listened quite patiently, asked me a few questions as to why I had come to him, told me to read him my questions, and asked me sharply, "Who wrote those questions?" I said, meekly, "I did." He looked at me critically, wrote something on a card, and dismissed me.

I was uncertain whether he had been so kind because he considered me a harmless lunatic or not. Once in the street, I read the card. I was to call again when he could giv me more time!

I went, not once, but many times. I devoted some months to brain anatomy and anthropology. In his laboratory he had brains from those of a mouse to those of the largest whale on record. He showed me the peculiarities of brains as shown by microscope and scales. He looked up points in foreign journals to which I had not access. In short, he did all he could to aid me; and he said that no such investigation as I was trying to learn about had ever yet been made, although no fair record of the difference of sex in brain, of which we hear so much, could possibly be made without it.

He was delightfully frank, earnest, and thoroughly honest. He knew—and, what is better, he was willing to tell—where knowledge stopped and guessing began, a point sadly confused, I found, by even prominent members of the profession.

In short, from him and through him, I collected material that is of intense interest and importance to women in this stage of the movement.

It is only right that I say here that I am of opinion that he does not himself believe in the equality of the sexes, but he is too thoroughly scientific to allow his hereditary bias to color his statements of facts on this or any subject.

In the hands of a man who has arrived at that point of mental poise and dignity, our case is safe, no matter what his sentiments may be.

Such men do not go to their emotions for premises when it comes to a statement of scientific facts. There are writers on this subject who do. And as you all know, any statement calmly and persistently made is reasonably sure to be accepted as true even by its victims. Frequency of iteration passes as proof.

Even thoughtful men, after spending years of time in trying to explain why a thing is true, often end with the discovery that it is not true at all.

We are all familiar with the story of the wrangle of the philosophers as to why a vessel containing water weighed no more with a fish weighing a pound in it than it did after the fish was removed.

After long and acrimonious debate over the principle of philosophy involved, some one bethought him to weigh them, and of course, discovered that no unfamiliar principle was involved, since it was a simple misstatement as to facts.

The assumption of "divine rights" by kings and priests stood as unquestioned facts for centuries by those who were the victims of both.

The "divine right" of men rests still on the same barefaced fraud, and is simply the last of this interesting trinity to die, and it naturally dies hard, as its fellows did.

If a charlatan to-day loudly asserts that he can do a certain thing, no matter how unlikely that thing is, if he insists that he has done it often, he will find many believers, who will spend much time in an attempt to explain how he does it, while only the few will think to question first if he does it.

Upon this basis of calm assumption on the one side, and credulous acceptance on the other, has grown up a very general belief that there are great and well-defined natural anatomical differences between the brains of the sexes of the human race; that these differences are well known to the medical practitioner or anatomist, and that they plainly indicate inferiority of capacity in the female brain, which is structural, while, strangely enough, no one argues that this is the case in the lower animals.

It therefore occurred to me to question—admitting that the microscope and scales really do show the differences to exist in adults—whether it would not be fair to assume, at least, that they are not natural and necessary sex differences, but that they are due to difference of opportunity and environment, and, under like conditions, would be produced between members of the same sex.

I proposed to test this by an appeal to the brains of infants. And my assumption, although not new, appeared to be borne out by the accepted, though unproven, theory that the brains of the men and women are nearer alike the lower we go into the human scale. This assumption is clearly based upon the idea that where the mental opportunities of the men and women are nearer equal the physical results are also similar. Indeed, Tapenard plainly states this fact in his anthropology. He says: "The reason that the brain of woman is lighter than that of man is that she has less cerebral activity to exercise in her sphere of duty." "In former times it was relativly larger in the department of Loziré, because then the woman and man mutually shared the burdens of the daily labor. The truth is that the weight of the brain increases with the use we make of it."

Since women are not given diversified and stimulating mental employment, they cannot be expected to show the results of such training on the brain mass itself.

I was started on my work in this matter by several articles written by the boldest of medical men in this country, who is the leader of the medical party which claims to be opposed to the educational and political advancement of woman because of the inevitable injury to her physical constitution. The writings of such a man, aided by the circulation and prestige of the leading journals of the country, which publish them as authoritativ, must inevitably influence school directors, voters, and legislators and go far to crystallize the belief that facts are well known to the medical profession with which it would be dangerous to trifle, when the truth is that the positiv knowledge on the subject is not sufficient at this moment to form even an intelligent guess upon. In spite of this fact, the well-known physician of whom I speak, Dr. Wm. A. Hammond, reiterates in these articles all of the old, and adds one or two new arguments to prove that woman should not be allowed to develop what brain she has, because she possesses very little and that little is of inferior quality.

Professor Romanes, who is said by many to stand second only to Herbert Spencer in his branch of science, has also recently published a very extensiv paper on mental differences of the sexes and the proper education of woman, which is unfortunately, but most probably honestly, based upon this same assumption, under the belief that it was a proven fact. His paper has been very widely copied in spite of its extreme length, and the fact that the same journals "absolutely cannot find space" for even a moderately long one on the other side. They say, "The public is not interested in it," that is—in its correction. I mention these two men not because they are peculiar in, but because they are honored representativs of, the so-called scientific school of objectors to human equality, and claim to base the right of male supremacy upon important scientific facts.

Of course, all this is an old assumption, and as such has been dealt with before. But Dr. Hammond now boldly asserts that these differences are easily discoverable by microscope and scales, and that they are natural, necessary sex differences.

He claims, first, that woman's brain is inferior to man's in size and quality and therefore in possibility.

Second. That these marks of inferiority are natural and potential and not produced by environment.

Third. That they are easily recognizable in the brain mass itself.

Fourth. That in consequence of these natural organic and fundamental differences the female brain is incapable of, first, accuracy; second, sustained or abstract thought; third, unbiased judgment (judicial fairness); fourth, the accomplishment of any real first-class or original work in the fields of science, art, politics, invention, or even literature. He points out the great danger to woman herself, and to the race as her children, of allowing her to attempt those things for which the structure of her brain shows her to be incapacitated.

From this outlook it is easy to see that the non-professional voter, the school director, and the legislator might really feel it to be his duty to protect woman against her own ambition. It is in this way that the assertions of such men can, and do, cause the greatest injury to woman. There are a number of other indictments; but for the present let us examin these: First, in the matter of size, the doctor concedes that the relativ size and weight of the brain in the sexes is about the same, slightly in woman's favor, which he says does not count; although, when he finds this same difference between men, as between higher and lower races, he argues that it does count for a great deal.

But in the dilemma to which this seemed to reduce him in proving his case, he says: "Numerous observations show beyond doubt that the intellectual power does not depend upon the weight of the brain relativ to that of the body so much as it depends upon absolute brain weight." Now, if this were the case, an elephant would out-think any of us, and the whale, whose intellectual achievements hav never been looked upon as absolutely incendiary—if we except Jonah's friend—would outrank the greatest man on record, and hav brain enough left to furnish material for a fair-sized female seminary.

The average human brain is said to weigh from 1,300 to 1,400 grams, and even a very young whale furnishes 2,312 grams of "intellect-producing substance," as the doctor felicitously terms it, while the brain of a large whale weighed in 1883 tipped the beam at 6,700 grams.

Truly, then, if absolute brain weight, and not relativ weight, is the test, here was a "mute inglorious Milton" indeed. Almost any elephant is several Cuviers in disguise, or perhaps an entire medical faculty.

The doctor says "the female brain, however, is not only smaller than that of man, but it is different in structure, and this fact involves much more as regards the character of the mental faculties than does the element of size." Again he says: "Thus accurate measurements show that the anterior portion of the brain, comprising the frontal lobes, in which the highest intellectual faculties reside, is much more developed in man than in woman, and this not only as regards its size but its convolutions also. Now, the part of the brain which is especially concerned in the evolution of mind is the gray matter, and this is increased or diminished in accordance with the number and complexity of the convolutions. The frontal lobes contain a greater amount of gray cortical matter than any other part of the brain, and they are, as we hav seen, larger in man than in woman."

Accepting these sweeping statements for the moment—although many of them are questioned by the highest authority—would it not be fair to test the case as to whether this difference in adults is fundamental and pre-natal, or whether it is the result of outside artificial influences, by an appeal to the brain of infants.

If the brains of one hundred infants (each child weighing ten pounds) were examined, would the brains of the fifty males be distinguishable from those of the fifty females?

In other words, when the weight of the body, the age, and other conditions are the same, as to health, parentage, etc., and before the artificial means of development, educational stimulus, and opportunity are applied to the one and withheld from the other, could the sex be determined by the difference in brain weight, shape, size, quality, or convolutions? That would be the test. It was in pursuance of this idea that I caused the following questions to be submitted to a large number of the leading brain students of America, went myself somewhat into the study of anthropology, and collected certain bits of information as to just how much basis there is for all this cry about the difference in men's and women's brains. Being a matter of heads, I wanted to know how much was "cry" and how much was "wool."

These are the questions submitted to the doctors, brain anatomists, and microscopists at the outset of my task:

1. Is it known to the medical profession whether in infants (of the same age, size, health, and inheritance at birth) the quantity, quality, and specific gravity of the gray matter differs in the sexes? Does the relativ amount of gray matter differ?

2. Do the convolutions? Form? Actual amount of gray matter, differ?

3. Given the brain, only, of a number of infants of the same age, weight, etc., could the sex be determined by the difference in shape, quantity, quality, and convolutions?

4. If so, are the differences more or less marked in infants or adults? Is the frontal region of the brain larger and more developed in male than in female infants? Is the difference as marked as in adults?

5. Does use, training, etc., develop gray matter, change texture, size, shape, etc., of the brain mass, or are these determined and fixed at birth? The same as to convolutions?

6. Does use hav to do with the location of the fissure of Rolando, or is that fixed at birth? In an uneducated man would there be as much of brain in front of this fissure as in a man of trained and developed mind?

7. Does use or development of the mental powers change the specific gravity of the brain matter? Would it be the same in a great scholar as in a common laborer of the same general size and health?

8. Is there unanimity of opinion on these questions? Are the facts known or only conjectured?

9. If ten boys of the same weight, health, and general inheritance were taken in infancy, and five of them subjected for fifty years to the conditions of a street or farm laborer, while the other five received all of the advantages of the life of a scholar, would the ten brains present the same relativ likenesses at death as at birth? Would opportunity and mental exercise make a change in the brains of the five students that would be discoverable by microscope and scales?

In reply to the last question, the universal opinion was that it would be fair to assume that such difference would be perceptible. But one of the replies was that these points must necessarily remain only conjectural, based upon reason and analogy, since we cannot do as the Scotch villager who shows to a wondering public the remains of a famous criminal, with this bit of history: "This is the skull and brain of a man who was hanged, at the age of forty, for murdering his entire family. This is the skull and brain of the same man at the age of seven. You can readily trace in the boy the man that was to be."

Is it not a fair presumption, since reason and analogy lead to this universally accepted theory, as between man and man, that the same causes would produce the same results when applied between man and woman? Strangely enough, this is not held to be the case by these acute reasoners against sex equality in brain.

But to illustrate once more the necessity of questioning facts first and the reasons for them afterward, I am assured by the most profound and capable students of these branches of science that if such differences exist in the brain of infants as are indicated by my questions, it is not known to those who make a specialty of brain study; but, upon the contrary, the differences between individuals of the same sex—in adults, at least—are known to be more marked than any that are known to exist between the sexes.

To illustrate, take the brains of the two poets, Byron and Dante. Byron's weighed 1,807 grms., while Dante's weighed only 1,320 grms., a difference of 487 grms.; or take two statesmen, Cromwell and Gambetta. Cromwell's brain weighed 2,210 grms., which, by the way, is the greatest on record—although Cuvier's is usually quoted as the largest, and a part of the weight of his was due to disease—while Gambetta's was only 1,241 grms., a difference of 969 grms. Surely it would not be held because of this that Gambetta and Dante should hav been denied the educational and other advantages which were the natural right of Byron and Cromwell.

Yet it is upon this very ground that it is proposed to deny women equal advantages and opportunities, although the difference in brain weight between man and woman is only said to be 100 grms., and even this does not allow for difference in body weight, and is based upon a system of averages, which is neither complete nor accurate.

There is then not only no proof that the sex of infants could be distinguished by their brains, but all of the evidence which does exist on this subject is wholly against the assumption.

Up to this point in my investigation I learned only what I had fully expected to learn. At the next step, and in connection with it, I met with information which seems to me to offer an opportunity for reflection upon the matter of mental, not to say verbal, accuracy in the sex which does not wear "bangs." In the papers referred to Dr. Hammond asserted, and no male voice or pen has seen fit to publicly correct him, that "it is only necessary to compare an average male with an average female brain to perceive at once how numerous and striking are the differences existing between them." He then submits a formidable list of striking differences, which includes these: "The male brain is larger, its vertical and transverse diameters are greater proportionally, the shape is quite different, the convolutions are more intricate, the sulci deeper, the secondary fissures more numerous, and the gray matter of the corresponding parts of the brain decidedly thicker."

But, as if all these were not enough to enable the merest novice to distinguish the one from the other, even if he were near-sighted, he offers these reinforcements: "It is quite certain, as the observations of the writer show, that the specific gravity of both the white and gray matter of the brain is greater in man than in woman." This would seem to leave woman without a reef to hang to; for, if by chance her brain did not fall short in gray matter, the specific gravity of the rest of it would enable the doctor to ticket her as accurately as though she were to appear with earrings and train in a ball-room. Of this point this is what the leading brain anatomist in America wrote me: "The only article recognized by the profession as important and of recent date which takes this theory as a working basis is by Morselli, and he is compelled to make the sinister admission, while asserting that the specific gravity is less in the female, that with old age and with insanity the specific gravity increases."

If this is the case, I don't know that women need sigh over their shortcoming in the item of specific gravity.

There appear to be two very simple methods open to them by which they may emulate their brothers in the matter of specific gravity if they so desire. One of these is certain, if they liv long enough, and the other—well, there is no protectiv tariff on insanity.

But to finally clinch his argument, Dr. Hammond continues: "The question is, therefore, not so much that of quantity"—which appears to collide with his statement that it was the "absolute brain weight which was the sublime test," and drops my whale into the water again—"as it is of quality. The brain of woman is different from that of man in structure."

Again I applied my test. Did all this difference of structure and quality appear in the infant or only in the adult brains? Since it is held that these very differences are the ones produced by education and properly diversified mental stimulus—as between man and man—is it not fair to assume that like causes produce like results as between man and woman?

Since woman has never had the advantages of these brain-developing processes, is it not fair to assume, if all these differences do exist, that it is less a matter of natural and characteristic inferiority than it is of environment and opportunity, unless it exists in the same ratio in infants?

That would be the test as to whether these are natural, necessary, pre-natal sex characteristics, or whether they are developed by external circumstances and environment. The physical sex characteristics which are natural are as readily distinguished at birth as at maturity.

But after a woman's waist and brain are put into tight laces and shaped to fit the fashion, it is a rather poor time to judge of her natural figure, either physical or mental. There was but one reply to my questions. It was this: No such test has ever been made with the brains of infants; and the wildest imagination could only stand appalled at the effort. It would be impossible to distinguish the male from the female child by these "radical, natural, easily discovered differences" in brain. I held, then, that the inference was perfectly legitimate that the great and numerous differences in the brains of adults—in so far as that was not, also, a mere flight of fancy—was not natural, pre-natal, and necessary; but that it was certainly fair to assume it to be producible by outside measures or environment; and that it could be no more natural or desirable for the digestiv organs and the brain of one sex to be decreased and deformed by pressure than it is for those of the other.

But I confess I was wholly unprepared for the final result of my last question and argument. I discovered that these differences are not only not known to exist in infants, but that in spite of all the talk, the pathetic warnings, and the absolute statements to the contrary, in a like number of adults' brains such differences are not only not to be "perceived at once," but that if Dr. Hammond or anybody else will agree to allow me to furnish him with twenty well-preserved adult brains, to be marked in cipher, so that he will not hav his information before he makes his test, he will find that his "numerous, striking, and easily perceived" differences will not appear with any relation to sex, so far as is known at the present time. I made this offer to him through the Popular Science Monthly some six months ago. Up to date the twenty brains I offered him to try on hav not been called for.

Upon the contrary, there will be found greater difference between individuals of the same sex than any known to exist between the sexes in any and all of these tests. In the main, since women weigh less than men, it would be pretty safe to guess that most of the lighter brains in one hundred specimens belonged to women, but this test would prove wrong in many cases, and the other tests would fail utterly.

And I will here present the concluding portion of a letter from Dr. E. C. Spitzka, the noted brain specialist, of New York:

> You may hold me responsible for the following declaration: That any statement to the effect that an observer can tell by looking at a brain, or examining it microscopically, whether it belonged to a female or a male subject, is not founded on carefully observed facts. The balance and the compass show slight differences, the weight of the male brain being greater and the angle formed by the fissure of Rolando forming a larger expansion of the frontal lobes; but both these points of difference hav been determined by the method of averages. They do not necessarily apply to the individual brain, and hence cannot be utilized to determin the sex of a single brain, except by those who are willing to take the chances of guessing. The assertion that the microscope reveals definit characteristic points of difference between the male and female brain is utterly incorrect. No such difference has ever been demonstrated, nor do I think it will be by more elaborate methods than those we now possess. Numerous female brains exceed numerous male brains in absolute weight, in complexity of convolutions, and in what brain anatomists would call the nobler proportions. So that he who takes these as his criteria of the male brain may be grievously mistaken in attempting to assert the sex of a brain dogmatically. If I had one hundred female brains and one hundred male brains, I should say that a selection from them containing one hundred of the largest and best-developed brains would probably contain fewer female brains than the remaining one hundred. More than this, no cautious brain anatomist would venture to declare.

I asked them why they did not correct the general impression which men of their profession had given out in this matter. They said they did not see the use of it; what difference did it make, anyhow? And then, it was a good enough "working theory." I said, "But suppose it worked the other way; do you think that you would say that it made no difference, and that a working theory that worked all one way was a safe or an honest one to be put forth as an established fact?" "Well, we are willing to tell you the truth about it," said they; "the fact is, it is all theory yet; there hav not been a sufficient number of tests made to warrant dogmatism in the matter; what more can you ask of us than that?" What, indeed?

I made another discovery; it was this: The brain of no remarkable woman has ever been examined!

Woman is ticketed to fit the hospital subjects and tramps, the unfortunates whose brains fall into the hands of the profession, as it were, by mere accident; while man is represented by the brains of the Cromwells, Cuviers, Byrons, and Spurzheims. By this method the average of men's brains is carried to its highest level; that of women is kept at its lowest, and even then there is only claimed one hundred grams difference.

It is on such statistics as this, it is with such dissimilar material, that they and we are judged.

Finally, I discovered that there is absolutely no definit information on the subject now in the hands or books of the medical profession which can justify the least show of dogmatism in the matter; or, if it were on the other side, it would be explained entirely away in five minutes—and there would not be the least question as to the desirability of the explanation either.

They told me not only that they did not know, but that no one could possibly prove it by means of the statistics and with the instruments in the hands of the profession to-day.

This being the case, perhaps it will be just as well for women to take a hand in the future investigations and statements themselvs, and I sincerely hope that the brains of some of our able women may be preserved and examined by honest brain students, so that we may hereafter hav our Cuviers and Websters and Cromwells. And I think I can tell where some of them can be found without a search warrant—when Miss Anthony, Mrs. Stanton, and a number of other women I hav the honor to know are done with theirs.

Until that is done, no honest or fair comparison is possible.

At present there is too great a desire on the part of these large-brained gentlemen like Dr. Hammond to look upon themselvs and their brains as "infant industries," entitled to and in need of a very high protectiv tariff, to prevent anything like a fair and equal competition with the feminin product.

But the fact is that we hav heard so much on the one side about woman's physical and mental shortcomings, and on the other side, from our Prohibition friends and others, so much of the "moral delinquencies" of men, that it seems to me we are in danger of believing both. And I, for one, am beginning to feel a good deal like Mark Twain's Irishman whenever I hear either one discussed.

He had been having a controversy with another man, and, as a final "clincher" to his side of the argument, said, with emphasis: "Now, I don't want to hear anything more from you on that subject but silence—and mighty little of that!"

Matters in Michigan.

That sleepless, subtle, insidious agency, that feeder of the church and perpetuator of its power and influence, the Young Men's Christian Association, has got the whip-hand on the Michigan University. This organization unblushingly boasts that it has perverted that institution to the teaching of Christianity; that it scandalously violates the right of private judgment, and through "strategy," espionage, and ostracism practically forces compliance with its behests. A "memorial" has emanated from their trustees, setting forth that thirty years ago the first College Christian Association in the country was organized at Ann Arbor; that it has grown in power until it is now preëminently the religious organization of the University; that its devotional Sunday morning meetings often average an attendance of four hundred students; that it publishes a monthly religious periodical, and claims that the society has outgrown the rooms which hav been given it in the University building, and, therefore, that the demand for a new building for the Association's use is imperativ, "not simply as a facility for work, great as is its need in that direction, but also to giv dignity and permanence to Christian work in the University," says the memorial. The impression seems to hav been an erroneous one that the state was not furnishing a University and paying its faculty for their religious proclivities, but the memorial claims they are in "activ sympathy with all efforts to advance the Christian religion among the students." That Michigan has its full quota of sectarian colleges no one can deny, and when soliciting appropriations the friends of Ann Arbor hav claimed for it its peculiar advantage as an institution for higher secular education. What astounding impudence, what unmitigated "gall," these exceedingly fresh-men display in their memorial! "Christianity is already a power in the University. The association is not asking for means to plant religion in the University, it is already there."

The professional thief might, with equal propriety, exhibit a purloined pocketbook to the owner, and assure him that he had no thought of theft, for he had secured what he was after. If the perversion of this university to the use of the Young Men's Christian Association is not a case of grand larceny on the people of Michigan, what is it? A census is given of the professing Christians and attendants upon Christian churches, in which the memorial makes a good showing numerically in favor, and we are quite willing to concede the figures if the following be correct: "Of the ninety-two persons comprising the faculties, fifty-nine are members of evangelical churches, at least nineteen more regular attendants and supporters, and seven are members of churches not counted evangelical. Thus the field is open for all religious effort, and every attempt to extend the influence of Christianity among the students will meet with the hearty coöperation of the officers of the University."

That this secular (?) institution is given up to the machinations of the Young Men's Christian Association is conclusivly proved by the following quotation: "The canvassing committee of the Association is organized in every class of every department for the purpose of reaching all the students that can be reached, and of exerting a moral and religious influence upon them. . . . Its work is opening out in every direction, and the possibilities of its influence are bounded only by the number of the students." The memorial then alludes to the attendance at the Michigan State University, showing it was second only to Harvard and held third place in the race with Cornell, and says with Jesuitical force, "It will be seen that here is a mighty center of influence—a strategic point which it would be folly to neglect." How do the Liberals of Michigan enjoy this Christian institution for which they are taxed, and "whose influence is bounded only by the number of students?" Liberals can silently contemplate that of its sixteen hundred students at least five hundred graduate each year with their minds dwarfed and prejudices formed, to take positions of trust and influence, especially in the public schools, where they will doubtless aim to transmit their Young Men's Christian Association impressions to the plastic minds in their charge, will assist in the elimination of science, in the suppression of Freethought, and in the ultimate enthronement of God in the fundamental law of the land—all this furnished by an institution on which they are compelled to pay their quota of taxation. It will ever be thus until Liberals take sufficient interest to aid the American Secular Union or a similar agency. This little local College Young Men's Christian Association asks for contributions to build a $15,000 building on the $3,000 lot which has been presented to it. It is safe enough to say they will get it. That is about three times the sum that the Liberals of the United States hav ever yet raised in one year for the most important work that ever human hand or brain attempted to enforce. Hav Liberals the courage, enthusiasm, and earnestness of their convictions? How many can or will answer in the affirmativ?

Secular principles, I am glad to say, are gaining ground in the city of Detroit, whose common council hav determined, as a preliminary step, to assess taxes on several institutions which hav heretofore successfully claimed exemption under a rather loose general law of the state, as being benevolent or religious institutions. Test cases will be made of these, and if sustained by the courts the council is prepared for further progress in this direction. My friend Judson Grinnel (brother to the most popular pastor of that city), who was in the legislature of 1887, proposed a bill to change the general tax law of the state so as to include church property (although adroitly worded), and that bill came within one vote of receiving the common council's recommendation for its passage—the strongest vote ever given in any Eastern city for impartial taxation.

The assessors are now empowered to levy taxes on the Young Men's Christian Association building and several public halls and private schools which hav shuffled off their responsibility on the benevolent, long-suffering public.

The Young Men's Christian Association building will hav to pay, and can well afford to do that from the rental of its flourishing barber-shop where they shave the heathen for Christ's sake and fifteen cents United States currency.

Hiberman Hall, for instance, has run a saloon in its building for purely benevolent purposes, dispensing drinks, however, at regular schedule rates.

Lafayette Hall is a popular dance-house and beer hall, I believe—and not strikingly benevolent in the size of its glasses, either, I hav heard. It is a little rusty in the style of its religion, also.

The Liggett Home, and the German-American Seminary, both private schools, besides the railroad depot—it being hard to realize whether this comes under the caption of "religious" or "benevolent"—will make the acquaintance of the city treasurer, and a healthy influence is abroad in the land.

Hav had the pleasure of meeting Brother J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw City, and his estimable and amiable better half—who is a perfect type of intelligence and culture. Brother Burnham is a profound thinker and an able lecturer, and was one of the most valued workers in the National Liberal League, having organized the state of Michigan thoroughly, prepared to do valiant battle for the cause; but the unfortunate division as to policy sunk the organization, which was of brightest promis to the state of Michigan, and up to the present it has been unable to reënlist sympathy. But Brother Burnham givs me the warmest assurance of his entire approbation of the present administration, and will do his best to bring his friends, who are numerous in Michigan, into fraternal union. Courtlandt Palmer well said that he knew no other man in our ranks who had made the personal and pecuniary sacrifices for the cause of Liberalism that had Brother Burnham. His Saginaw congregation (while he was a minister), recognizing his talents, lavished everything upon him, built him an elegant and stately edifice, but when he had a conviction he was never swerved by considerations of consequences to his prospects, but struck out boldly, proudly feeling that he could better afford to be a "man" than the best-salaried minister. Though his Liberal advocacy has not by any means brought him wealth, he livs in the same community in which he actually held his pulpit, and commands the respect of the most orthodox.

Colonel Ingersoll on Christianity.

North American Review, May, 1888.

I do not remember ever to hav read a composition, in which the merely local coloring of particular, or even very limited sections of Christianity, was more systematically used as if it had been available and legitimate argument against the whole, than in the Reply before us. Colonel Ingersoll writes with a rare and enviable brilliancy, but also with an impetus which he seems unable to control. Denunciation, sarcasm, and invectiv, may in consequence be said to constitute the staple of his work; and, if argument or some favorable admission here and there peeps out for a moment, the writer soon leaves the dry and barren hights for his favorit and more luxurious galloping grounds beneath. Thus, when the Reply has consecrated a line (North American Review, No. 372, p. 473) to the pleasing contemplation of his opponent as "manly, candid, and generous," it immediately devotes more than twelve to a declamatory denunciation of a practice (as if it were his) altogether contrary to generosity and to candor, and reproaches those who expect (ibid) "to receive as alms an eternity of joy." I take this as a specimen of the mode of statement which permeates the whole Reply. It is not the statement of an untruth. The Christian receives as alms all whatsoever he receives at all. Qui salvandos salvas gratis is his song of thankful praise. But it is the statement of one half of a truth, which livs only in its entirety, and of which the Reply givs us only a mangled and bleeding frustum. For the gospel teaches that the faith which saves is a living and energizing faith, and that the most precious part of the alms which we receive lies in an ethical and spiritual process, which partly qualifies for, but also and emphatically composes, this conferred eternity of joy.

I will giv another instance of the tumultuous method in which the Reply conducts, not, indeed, its argument, but its case. Dr. Field had exhibited an example of what he thought superstition, and had drawn a distinction between superstition and religion. But to the author of the Reply all religion is superstition, and, accordingly, he writes as follows (p. 475):

"You are shocked at the Hindoo mother, when she givs her child to death at the supposed command of her God. What do you think of Abraham? of Jephthah? What is your opinion of Jehovah himself?"

I am aware of no reason why any believer in Christianity should not be free to canvass, regret, condemn the act of Jephthah. So far as the narration which details it is concerned, there is not a word of sanction given to it more than to the falsehood of Abraham in Egypt, or of Jacob and Rebecca in the matter of the hunting (Gen. xx, 1–18, and Gen. xxiii); or to the dissembling of St. Peter in the case of the Judaizing converts (Gal. ii, 11). I am aware of no color of approval given to it elsewhere. But possibly the author of the Reply may hav thought he found such an approval in the famous eleventh chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews, where the apostle, handling his subject with a discernment and care very different from those of the Reply, writes thus (Heb. xi, 32):

"And what shall I say more? For the time would fail me to tell of Gideon, and of Barak, and of Samson, and of Jephthah: of David also, and Samuel, and of the prophets."

Jephthah, then, is distinctly held up to us by a canonical writer as an object of praise. But of praise on what account? Why should the Reply assume that it is on account of the sacrifice of his child? The writer of the Reply has given us no reason, and no rag of reason, in support of such a proposition. But this was the very thing he was bound by every consideration to prove, upon making his indictment against the almighty. In my opinion, he could hav one reason only for not giving a reason, and that was that no reason could be found.

The matter, however, is so full of interest, as illustrating both the method of the Reply and that of the apostolic writer, that I shall enter farther into it, and draw attention to the very remarkable structure of this noble chapter, which is to faith what the thirteenth of 1 Cor. is to charity. From the first to the thirty-first verse, it commemorates the achievements of faith in ten persons: Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses (in greater detail than anyone else), and finally Rahab, in whom, I observe in passing, it will hardly be pretended that she appears in this list on account of the profession she had pursued. Then comes the rapid recital (v. 31), without any specification of particulars whatever, of these four names: Gideon, Barak, Samson, Jephthah. Next follows a kind of recommencement, indicated by the word also; and the glorious acts and sufferings of the prophets are set forth largely, with a singular power and warmth, headed by the names of David and Samuel, the rest of the sacred band being mentioned only in the mass.

Now, it is surely very remarkable that, in the whole of this recital, the apostle, whose "feet were shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace," seems with a tender instinct to avoid anything like stress on the exploits of warriors. Of the twelve persons having a share in the detailed expositions, David is the only warrior, and his character as a man of war is eclipsed by his greater attributes as a prophet, or declarer of the divine counsels. It is yet more noteworthy that Joshua, who had so fair a fame, but who was only a warrior, is never named in the chapter, and we are simply told that "by faith the walls of Jericho fell down, after they had been compassed about seven times" (Heb. xi, 30). But the series of four names, which are given without any specification of their title to appear in the list, are all names of distinguished warriors. They had all done great acts of faith and patriotism against the enemies of Israel—Gideon against the Midianites, Barak against the hosts of Syria, Samson against the Philistines, and Jephthah against the children of Ammon. Their title to appear in the list at all is in their acts of war, and the mode of their treatment as men of war is in striking accordance with the analogies of the chapter. All of them had committed errors. Gideon had again and again demanded a sign, and had made a golden ephod, "which thing became a snare unto Gideon and to his house" (Judges viii, 27). Barak had refused to go up against Jabin unless Deborah would join the venture (Judges v, 8). Samson had been in dalliance with Delilah. Last came Jephthah, who had, as we assume, sacrificed his daughter in fulfilment of a rash vow. No one supposes that any of the others are honored by mention in the chapter on account of his sin or error; why should that supposition be made in the case of Jephthah, at the cost of all the rules of orderly interpretation?

Having now answered the challenge as to Jephthah, I proceed to the case of Abraham. It would not be fair to shrink from touching it in its tenderest point. That point is nowhere expressly touched by the commendations bestowed upon Abraham in scripture. I speak now of the special form, of the words that are employed. He is not commended because, being a father, he made all the preparations antecedent to plunging the knife into his son. He is commended (as I read the text) because, having received a glorious promis, a promis that his wife should be a mother of nations, and that kings should be born of her (Gen. xvii, 6), and that by his seed the blessings of redemption should be conveyed to man, and the fulfilment of this promis depending solely upon the life of Isaac, he was, nevertheless, willing that the chain of these promises should be broken by the extinction of that life, because his faith assured him that the almighty would find the wav to giv effect to his own designs (Heb. xi, 17–19). The offering of Isaac is mentioned as a completed offering, and the intended blood-shedding, of which I shall speak presently, is not here brought into view.

The facts, however, which we hav before us, and which are treated in scripture with caution, are grave and startling. A father is commanded to sacrifice his son. Before consummation the sacrifice is interrupted. Yet the intention of obedience had been formed, and certified by a series of acts. It may hav been qualified by a reserve of hope that God would interpose before the final act, but of this we hav no distinct statement, and it can only stand as an allowable conjecture. It may be conceded that the narrativ does not supply us with a complete statement of particulars. That being so, it behooves us to tread cautiously in approaching it. Thus much, however, I think, may further be said: the command was addressed to Abraham under conditions essentially different from those which now determin for us the limits of moral obligation.

For the conditions, both socially and otherwise, were indeed very different. The estimate of human life at the time was different. The position of the father in the family was different: its members were regarded as in some sense his property. There is every reason to suppose that, around Abraham in "the land of Moriah," the practice of human sacrifice as an act of religion was in vigor. But we may look more deeply into the matter. According to the book of Genesis, Adam and Eve were placed under a law, not of consciously perceived right and wrong, but of simple obedience. The tree, of which alone they were forbidden to eat, was the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Duty lay for them in following the command of the most high, before and until they, or their descendants, should become capable of appreciating it by an ethical standard. Their condition was greatly analogous to that of the infant, who has just reached the stage at which he can comprehend that he is ordered to do this or that, but not the nature of the thing so ordered. To the external standard of right and wrong, and to the obligation it entails per se, the child is introduced by a process gradually unfolded with the development of his nature, and the opening out of what we term a moral sense. If we pass at once from the epoch of paradise to the period of the prophets, we perceive the important progress that has been made in the education of the race. The almighty, in his mediate intercourse with Israel, deigns to appeal to an independently conceived criterion, as to an arbiter between his people and himself. "Come, now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord" (Isa. i, 18). "Yet ye say the way of the Lord is not equal. Hear now, O house of Israel, is not my way equal, are not your ways unequal?" (Ezek. xvii, 25). Between these two epochs how wide a space of moral teaching has been traversed! But Abraham, so far as we may judge from the pages of scripture, belongs essentially to the Adamic period, far more than to the prophetic. The notion of righteousness and sin was not indeed hidden from him: transgression itself had opened that chapter, and it was never to be closed: but as yet they lay wrapped up, so to speak, in divine command and prohibition. And what God commanded, it was for Abraham to believe that he himself would adjust to the harmony of his own character.

It was an observation of Aristotle that weight attaches to the undemonstrated propositions of those who are able to speak in any given subject matter from experience. The Reply abounds in undemonstrated propositions. They appear, however, to be delivered without any sense of a necessity that either experience or reasoning are required in order to giv them a title to acceptance. Thus, for example, the system of Mr. Darwin is hurled against Christianity as a dart which cannot but be fatal (p. 475).

"His discoveries, carried to their legitimate conclusion, destroy the creeds and sacred scriptures of mankind."

This wide-sweeping proposition is imposed upon us with no exposition of the how or the why; and the whole controversy of belief, one might suppose, is to be determined, as if from St. Petersburgh, by a series of ukases. It is only advanced, indeed, to decorate the introduction of Darwin's name in support of the proposition, which I certainly should support and not contest, that error and honesty are compatible.

On what ground, then, and for what reason, is the system of Darwin fatal to scriptures and to creeds? I do not enter into the question whether it has passed from the stage of working hypothesis into that of demonstration, but I assume, for the purposes of the argument, all that, in this respect, the Reply can desire.

It is not possible to discover, from the random language of the Reply, whether the scheme of Darwin is to sweep away all theism, or is to be content with extinguishing revealed religion. If the latter is meant, I should reply that the moral history of man, in its principal stream, has been distinctly an evolution from the first until now; and that the succinct though grand account of the creation in Genesis is singularly accordant with the same idea, but is wider than Darwinism, since it includes in the grand progression the inanimate world as well as the history of organisms. But, as this could not be shown without much detail, the Reply reduces me to the necessity of following its own unsatisfactory example in the bald form of an assertion, that there is no colorable ground for assuming evolution and revelation to be at variance with one another.

If, however, the meaning be that theism is swept away by Darwinism, I observe that, as before, we hav only an unreasoned dogma or dictum to deal with, and, dealing perforce with the unknown, we are in danger of striking at a will of the wisp. Still, I venture on remarking that the doctrin of evolution has acquired both praise and dispraise which it does not deserve. It is lauded in the skeptical camp because it is supposed to get rid of the shocking idea of what are termed sudden acts of creation; and it is as unjustly dispraised, on the opposing side, because it is thought to bridge over the gap between man and the inferior animals, and to giv emphasis to the relationship between them. But long before the day either of Mr. Darwin or his grandfather, Dr. Erasmus Darwin, this relationship had been stated, perhaps even more emphatically, by one whom, were it not that I hav small title to deal in undemonstrated assertion, I should venture to call the most cautious, the most robust, and the most comprehensiv of our philosophers. Suppose, says Bishop Butler (Analogy, Part 2, Chap. 2), that it were implied in the natural immortality of brutes, that they must arrive at great attainments, and become (like us) rational and moral agents; even this would be no difficulty, since we know not what latent powers and capacities they may be endowed with. And if pride causes us to deem it an indignity that our race should hav proceeded by propagation from an ascending scale of inferior organisms, why should it be a more repulsiv idea to hav sprung immediately from something less than man in brain and body, than to hav been fashioned according to the expression in Genesis (Chap. ii, v. 7) "out of the dust of the ground?" There are halls and galleries of introduction in a palace, but none in a cottage; and this arrival of the creativ work at its climax through an ever aspiring preparatory series, rather than by transition at a step from the inanimate mold of earth, may tend rather to magnify than to lower the creation of man on its physical side. But if belief has (as commonly) been premature in its alarms, has non-belief been more reflectiv in its exulting anticipations, and its peans on the assumed disappearance of what are strangely enough termed sudden acts of creation from the sphere of our study and contemplation?

"Why should God demand a sacrifice from man? Why should the infinit ask anything from the finite? Should the sun beg of the glow-worm, and should the momentary spark excite the envy of the source of light?"

This is one of the cases in which happy or showy illustration is, in the Reply before me, set to carry with a rush the position which argument would hav to approach more laboriously and more slowly. The case of the glow-worm with the sun cannot but move a reader's pity, it seems so very hard. But let us suppose for a moment that the glow-worm was so constituted, and so related to the sun that an interaction between them was a fundamental condition of its health and life; that the glow-worm must, by the law of its nature, like the moon, reflect upon the sun, according to its strength and measure, the light which it receives, and that only by a process involving that reflection its own store of vitality could be upheld? It will be said that this is a very large petitio to import into the glow-worm's case. Yes, but it is the very petitio which is absolutely requisit in order to make it parallel to the case of the Christian. The argument which the Reply has to destroy is and must be the Christian argument, and not some figure of straw, fabricated at will. It is needless, perhaps, but it is refreshing, to quote the noble Psalm (Ps. l, 10, 12, 14, 15), in which this assumption of the Reply is rebuked. "All the beasts of the forest are mine; and so are the cattle upon a thousand hills. . . . If I be hungry I will not tell thee; for the whole world is mine, and all that is therein. . . . Offer unto God thanksgiving; and pay thy vows unto the Most Highest, and call upon Me in the time of trouble; so will I hear thee, and thou shalt praise Me." Let me try my hand at a counter illustration. If the infinit is to make no demand upon the finite, by parity of reasoning the great and strong should scarcely make them on the weak and small. Why then should the father make demands of love, obedience, and sacrifice from his young child? Is there not some flavor of the sun and glow-worm here? But every man does so make them, if he is a man of sense and feeling; and he makes them for the sake and in the interest of the son himself, whose nature, expanding in the warmth of affection and pious care, requires, by an inward law, to return as well as receive. And so God asks of us, in order that what we giv to him may be far more our own than it ever was before the giving, or than it could hav been unless first rendered up to him, to become a part of what the gospel calls our treasure in heaven.

Although the Reply is not careful to supply us with whys, it does not hesitate to ask for them (p. 479):

"Why should an infinitly wise and powerful God destroy the good and preserve the vile? Why should he treat all alike here, and in another world make an infinit difference? Why should your God allow his worshipers, his adorers, to be destroyed by his enemies? Why should he allow the honest, the loving, the noble to perish at the stake?"

The upholders of belief or of revelation, from Claudian down to Cardinal Newman (see the very remarkable passage of the Apologia pro vitâ suâ, pp. 376–78), cannot and do not, seek to deny that the methods of divine government, as they are exhibited by experience, present to us many and varied moral problems, insoluble by our understanding. Their existence may not, and should not, be dissembled. But neither should they be exaggerated. Now, exaggeration by mere suggestion is the fault, the glaring fault, of these queries. One who had no knowledge of mundane affairs beyond the conception they insinuate would assume that, as a rule, evil has the upper hand in the management of the world. Is this the grave philosophical conclusion of a careful observer, or is it a crude, hasty, and careless overstatement?

It is not difficult to conceive how, in times of sadness and of storm, when the suffering soul can discern no light at any point of the horizon, place is found for such an idea of life. It is, of course, opposed to the apostolic declaration that godliness hath the promis of the life that now is (1 Tim. iv, 8), but I am not to expect such a declaration to be accepted as current coin, even of the meanest value, by the author of the Reply. Yet I will offer two observations founded on experience in support of it, one taken from a limited, another from a larger and more open sphere. John Wesley, in the full prime of his mission, warned the converts whom he was making among English laborers of a spiritual danger that lay far ahead. It was that, becoming godly, they would become careful, and, becoming careful, they would become wealthy. It was a just and sober forecast, and it represented with truth the general rule of life, although it be a rule perplexed with exceptions. But, if this be too narrow a sphere of observation, let us take a wider one, the widest of all. It is comprised in the brief statement that Christendom rules the world, and rules it, perhaps it should be added, by the possession of a vast surplus of material as well as moral force. Therefore the assertions carried by implication in the queries of the Reply, which are general, are because general untrue, although they might hav been true within those prudent limitations which the method of this Reply appears especially to eschew.

Land Reform in 1848 and 1888.

GEORGE HENRY EVANS AND HENRY GEORGE.

The plan of Mr. Evans was this: By political agitation and control of the legislature to place a limit to the ownership of land. This principle had already been applied to religious and other corporate institutions, and to the patenting of the public lands "only to actual settlers in limited quantities." The maximum had been fixed at one hundred and sixty acres. Mr. Evans suggested this as a limit to private ownership, not as a fixed quantity, but to obtain a recognition of the right of government to so limit it, to be modified as wisdom should direct in the future. He contemplated a peaceful attainment of this object, by wise gradations, invading no "vested rights," yet effectually preventing any further accumulation of landed estates beyond the legal limit, whether by purchase, gift, or inheritance. All of these matters are held to be subjects properly regulativ by statute law. The advocates of land nationalization propose to hav the state resume the title to the land it has once already sold to private parties; to be rented back to those who want and are able to hire. Mr. George simplifies this process by treating land values as simply the amount of rent the land will yield, and taxing it back entire without any disturbance to owners or to occupiers. This may be termed "a short method" of "land nationalization." It means "confiscation of rent."

You hav here substantially the means proposed by the two men, representing different schools and distinct periods, for the reform of a universally admitted evil, the monopolized control of the only passiv factor in production—the home and standing-place and work-room of the whole human family. They are in accord fully as to the nature of the evil to be remedied, and, indeed, as to the necessity of securing political supremacy to accomplish the reform. The great object, as both agree, is justice to labor, the abolition of poverty, and the promotion of the public good. But the measures for which such political power is to be wielded in order to accomplish those ends are wholly incompatible with each other. The one sought equality through limitation of power and restriction of privilege, mutually operativ as to all citizens of a state. The other seeks the annihilation of a class, allodial owners, embracing those whose ownership promotes social prosperity, as well as those which endanger it, and the making of every occupant of the land a tenant of the state, but offers no guarantee whatever against the unlimited control of the land through lease-hold, or the extension of legal privilege to the lordly rule of capital, such leases would giv.

Now, limitation of powers is involved in, and is, indeed, the professed burden of all forms of legislation whatever. Limitation to private ownership of an essential, natural element, indispensable to the life and to the well-being of the individual, is a logical and constitutional means of redress, under any view of law which ever prevailed. It accords with our system of tenure, which assumes that the right of occupancy is in every one of the whole people. "Confiscation of rent," on the other hand, would require an entire subversion of our system of occupancy, and of well-established principles of property; is inconsistent with our Constitution, if we hav one, and being revolutionary in its character should only be resorted to in the last extremity, even were it in itself wise and feasible. This remedy is, doubtless, compatible with the fictions of English law, and of monarchy by "divine right;" but not by any theory of democracy or principles of equity with which I am acquainted. But I think the time for promoting any positiv reform of the land system through political ascendency, and by legislativ preponderance of an honest purpose to effect a public good, has long since passed away, through either Mr. George's or Mr. Evans's schemes. For it is quite apparent now to clear-headed people that the land question, and all other questions of human interest, will take care of themselvs, if governments will let them alone, withdraw their bailiffs, tax-gatherers, detectiv police, and bandit, mercenary soldiery.

Social industry from its primitiv communal organization has passed through three phases of development. In the patriarchal state labor had some degrees of organization, in which the more spontaneous coöperation of the tribe or community became subjected to authority and to the order of an arbitrary will, whose rude directorship effected some approach to the combination and division of labor, more lately established.

Next, in the struggle and as the consequent growth of leadership in their interminable wars and the rise of monarchical rule, the warlike organization of labor was effected, under the militant spirit, and became compulsorily coöperativ, a system characterized by Hobbes as having "selfishness everywhere and unlimited power somewhere." On the decline of the militant spirit and as the rule of law obtained and constitutional governments became established, what may be termed the litigant organization of labor took place and became semi-voluntary in place of wholly involuntary; but of the apparent freedom under this now existing form much is the result of a compulsory assent effected through the various fictions and subtle devices of our transmitted legalities, not less invasiv than the sword of the freebooter or the lash of the slaveholder. In nothing is this so conspicuous and so fatal to social life and progress as in the falseness of the law of property and of the unlimited dominion of the land, under the law of the market.

The inability to defend our land system on any ethical or economic grounds, the agreement of all thinkers that it is incompatible with any rule but one of despotism, and the necessity for a system of organization of labor and coöperation which shall embrace division as well as production, indicates a possible future type of labor organization wherein a broader freedom and a clearer sense of mutual help and mutual benefit will secure a more fully developed sustaining system, and one which will promote, not the military, civic, or material aggrandizement of a nation, or of an individual, but the development of higher activities, and the pursuit of nobler aims. It is simply idle to suppose that the dangerous class who aspire to profit by making, interpreting, and enforcing, and also in evading, our system of legal quiddities will ever willingly further any such reform whatever, or propose to aid any salutary cause except for the purpose of betraying it.

A matter of secondary interest seems proper to be noticed. I hav said Mr. Evans did not claim originality. Mr. George's friends, at least, claim it for him, and also the position of leader. Now, some of his economic speculations are doubtless original, and some are true as well, and important; but his "sovereign remedy" is in no respect new, whether true or otherwise. Mr. Thomas Spence wrote his book long before Mr. George was born. Mr. John Stuart Mill discerned the "unearned increment," and his remedy for that is not essentially different from the "confiscation of rent." Mr. George shows that land values are determined by the rent, and the taking of that he calls, "taxing away land values." He quotes Herbert Spencer in "Social Statics," as giving a feasible plan by the assumption of ownership by the state and renting to individuals, but says it is not the best plan, and then says: "What I propose, therefore, as the simple, yet sovereign, remedy, . . . is to appropriate rent by taxation." If this is not specifically a claim to originality, it justifies an inference that he intended it so to be understood.

Now, I hav a book published by B. B. Mussey & Co., Boston, 1851, a reprint of an English publication, termed, "Science of Politics," containing a treatis on "Property in Land" from a philosophical rather than from an economical view, arraigning in a remarkably forcible manner unlimited private ownership of land. The remedy prescribed is this: "By the division of its annual value or rent, that is, by making the rent of the soil the common property of the nation . . . by taking the whole of the taxes out of the rents of the soil, and thereby abolishing all other kinds of taxation whatever. And thus all industry would be absolutely emancipated from every burden, and every man would reap such natural reward as his skill, industry, and enterprise rendered legitimately his, according to the natural law of competition."

Here we hav the same "single tax" and "confiscation of rent" which Mr. George advocates. This writer even anticipates George's argument against "equal division of the land" and the "scheme of limitation." He also anticipates George's hypothesis that land can be taxed without taxing labor. He says: "Where land is taxed no man is taxed, nor does the taxation of land interfere in any way whatever with the progress of human industry" (pp. 382–384).

The absurdity of this position, or that anything can be taxed permanently except human labor, I hav not time now to show. The singular coincidence of thought here seen may not prove plagiarism against Mr. George, for ideas are not invented, but grow. It is safe to assume, however, that the later growth is upon the earlier, and not the earlier upon the later. The name of this author is unknown to me. The book itself is evidently a reprint of an English work, and bears evidence of having been written before Mr. George had entered his teens, as early as 1849. It is thus clearly identified with the agitation of 1848. To tax economic rent is merely to confiscate what, from circumstance, one may hav produced more than another.

In conclusion, it seems proper to refer to the meager recognition which Mr. George has vouchsafed to the labors of Mr. Evans and of the men who prepared the way through which his work was rendered possible. He says:

> Nothing can be accomplished by such timid, illogical measures. If we would cure social diseases we must go to the root. There is no use in talking of reserving what there may be left of our public domain to actual settlers. That would be merely locking the stable door after the horse had been stolen, and even if it were not, would avail nothing.
> There is no use in talking about restricting the amount of land one man may hold. That, if it were practicable, were idle, and would not meet the difficulty (Social Problems, pp. 275, 276).

This wholesale begging of the question, without even a candid statement of it, indicates a mind dissatisfied with its own relation to the subject. The above, however, is substantially all he has to say of his predecessors in the reform, or of their reasonings upon the subject on which he is at issue with them, in the eight or nine hundred pages which make up his two volumes. The well-intentioned efforts of Mr. Evans and his confrères had been pertinaciously followed up for an entire generation. It is true that they looked to political action and legislativ expedients as effectiv agencies of reform, and so in that regard their labors were fruitless. But Mr. George has not learned from their failure, but has repeated their blunders, even if he has not used the reform as a means to political preferment and the advancement of party aims. The land reformers of 1848 who followed the lead of Mr. Evans hav kept alive the embers of the fire that glowed in that early day, and now by placing their reform upon the broad ground of economic and industrial law hav made the scientific consideration of land ownership imperativ. Mr. George's remedy is wholly empirical, and is suggested by no principle of law or fact of economy. In subjecting the question to careful analysis, and to the test of the social good, we hav placed it in the line of positiv settlement, without or in spite of political scheming, caucus dictation, purchased votes, or stuffed ballot-boxes; for nothing can stand before the advance of exact knowledge. There is no rebellion against mathematics; and no demonstrated truth can be suppressed by any despotic rule. In the words of Ruskin: "We liv in an epoch of change, and probably of revolution; thoughts that cannot be put aside are in the minds of all men capable of thought. One principle can, in the end will, close all epochs of revolution—that each man shall possess the ground he can use and no more."

A peaceful evolution of industry and society will then ensue; and the rule of ignorant, arbitrary will of monarch or majority will end, when helpful science and progressiv thought shall free mankind from their superstitious reverence for ecclesiastical dogmas and legal fictions.

Institutionalism.

I am by no means anti-religious in belief, but must confess that those who call themselvs Infidels, or are so termed, hav more true Christianity in their hearts than the average church-member. Show me a man noted for his kindness to the poor and for his strict practice of the injunction, "Do as you would be done by," and it is a hundred to one he is a Freethinker, and far from being one of the "unco guid or rigidly righteous."

Priestcraft has perverted the true religion of the Buddhas, Christs, Mohammeds, and other reformers into an accursed phariseeism. People are not logical or capable of drawing correct conclusions from what they read. If they were, the church-members must wonder in their hearts at the inconsistencies of their church practices with the teachings of the gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, of Paul, and others.

I wonder how a Presbyterian can attend his church and listen to the half-hour prayers, the doctrins, and observe the practices there without coming to the conclusion that whoever founded his sect was doing exactly contrary to the orders of Christ—was, in fact, copying the very system he so severely denounced when he gave the Lord's Prayer as an example and cursed those long-praying Pharisees and hypocrits.

I heard one of the most narrow and bigoted of this church say to a couple of his brethren only a few days ago: "If I had to raise a fund to aid some poor widow and orphans, upon my word, I would go out among the saloons and the wicked people before I would go to our church!" "Why so?" I asked. "Well, sir, I cannot tell you why. It is a mystery to me. I hav learned it since I hav been in the mercantil business during ten years past. I do know that our church-members are not charitable." He admitted that he was, late in life, getting his eyes open to many facts that are new to him.

For my part, I conclude that those institutions called churches hav served a purpose. Man has worked slowly upward from the beast, and there is much of the ape and tiger in him yet. The religion of men is no better than themselvs. Compare, for instance, the fiendish persecuting spirit of Catholics and Protestants during ages with the very different spirit of liberal Catholic Belgium or liberal Protestant England.

And yet these followers of the man who had not where to lay his head; who was born in a stable, lived as a poor outcast all his life, and died as a condemned malefactor between two thieves; who endured that despised life purposely for an example; whose original followers lived and died in about the same way, and whose greatest apostle, Paul, constantly impressed this lesson of humility, saying, "You all did see that I wrought with mine own hands for an example"—these modern followers build lofty temples, adorn them splendidly, and giv to their chief priests almost infinit annual sums each, while they compel the real working clergy to endure excruciating poverty. So much does man's selfish, contemptible spirit distort everything right and left.

The plainest, clearest lesson of humility, charity, meekness, and long-suffering has been tortured into a practice the most contrary that can be imagined. Individual greed makes an institution out of it.

And so, likewise, a few honest, earnest, philosophic minds invented a simple form of government for our country, to be conducted on the plainest, cheapest principles. They left the making of the laws to certain servants of the people, without any duty to refer the laws to the people for indorsement. The founders of the affair said that, "As to all matters of police and ten thousand other things connected with daily life, the people must attend to them within their own families, or their own communities, counties, or states." "No free government is possible where details are administered from a center, for such a government will grow with the years, ever creating new places, bureaus, laws, etc."

If, now, so plain a foundation for a religion had, in two centuries, become so reversed as had the religious basis laid by Christ, does anyone believe that the foundation of a plain, cheap government could remain as it was devised, especially when it was left to the greed and selfishness of lawmakers to shape it gradually as they saw fit? Thousands of new laws are proposed at every session of Congress. Hundreds are framed, all to giv excuse for raising more revenue. The very power to tax has been diverted to make business. The most complex and extravagant system of central administration the world has ever seen has grown up out of the simplest formula. The cost of the civil list which has overthrown every government in the past by its secret, malignant, cancerous consumption has been increased sixteen times, or sixteen hundred per cent, since 1842, when three hundred per cent would hav been an enormity.

The ignorant laugh and sneer, but the student of history and of human nature knows that nothing short of force can giv to accumulated wealth more of the earnings of labor than a certain small percentage, and that the force always comes at command of the law's executiv. Where is your free government when he for whom it was created labors under "the protection" of guns? HOLT.

The Gospel According to Common Sense.

THE PENITENT THIEF.

I am not going to discuss the question of capital punishment, or say whether or not it is desirable to deprive a brutal murderer of the power to do any further mischief. I leave such questions to those whom it may concern. My present subject is a thief. It is fortunate for some of us that they do not crucify thieves in the present day. It is especially fortunate for myself that they do not crucify blasphemers. That one blasphemer and two thieves suffered capital punishment in the year 1, that is to say, about eighteen hundred years ago, is a matter of history that it does not answer my purpose to dispute. They suffered under the theocratic law promulgated by Moses, which, as I hav said, fortunately for many of us is no longer in force. Yet there is a relic of it remaining—if not in the United States, certainly in England. It is not long since three men were sentenced to imprisonment by a truculent judge under a statute passed in the Dark Ages of medieval bigotry, which ought long since to hav been repealed. Their offense was the publication of a picture ridiculing Jehovah.

It is not with the blasphemer, but with the thief, that we hav to do. For what particular offense the "penitent" thief was executed the scripture does not say. Most likely he was one of the followers of Jesus—a hanger-on and loafer at the "camp-meetings," prowling around for what he could pick up. If they were to hang all such characters in the present day, it would probably be a good riddance, but the authorities would hav to provide an awful amount of rope. Even the Jews did not go to that length, but they hanged the revivalist preacher instead. His following consisting largely of thieves and prostitutes, they hanged a couple of the former by way of example.

Here was an inglorious end of the promised kingdom, which the disciples of Jesus confidently expected to become something more substantial than a kingdom of air. There were evidently office-seekers among them. James and John, the sons of Zebedee, wanted to sit the one on the right side and the other on the left—prime minister and secretary of state. Peter chose to be minister of war, and carried a sword. Judas was already appointed chancellor of the exchequer. As for the rank and file, soured with disappointment, and seeing no further prospect of free feasts, they reviled their former master, and taunted him with, "He saved others, himself he cannot save." The two thieves who were crucified with him cast the same in his teeth. The supposed prayer of the "penitent" one was in reality a sarcasm. In what other sense can such a request be understood, coming at such a time, from such a character? And what does the answer of Jesus amount to but an acknowledgment that they were both in the same fix, and that night they would be lying in the grave together? The term "paradise," to which a fanciful meaning has been given, simply implies an inclosed place or garden, such as cemeteries probably were then, and such as they are in the present day.

This is a common-sense reading of the incident, which, if it be a fact, has been magnified and distorted into a fable by those who profess to see another meaning therein. If, as some suppose, there is a paradise for disembodied spirits in which they retain their individuality and liv forever, it is not a pleasant outlook for those who wish to exchange this "wicked world" for a better one that so many thieves and murderers hav preceded them to the same place. The society there will be, not a little, but a great deal mixed. I hardly know which would be most disagreeable to me, the malefactors or those who furnished them with passports. A deathbed repentance is a very natural conclusion to an ill-spent life, but neither entitles nor qualifies the penitent for a heritage of bliss. Such an outrageous fiction as a place of eternal punishment is now generally exploded by all sane Christians, but they should remember that there is just as much authority for it as for their hypothetical heaven, and if they giv up one they must giv up the other.

THE LORD'S SUPPER.

The last recorded act of Jesus previous to his execution was probably the most sensible thing he ever did in his life. He invited his disciples to supper, gave them plenty to eat and drink, and told them if they wished to liv long and see good times they must keep it up in remembrance of what he told them. Jesus was no ascetic. He was neither a vegetarian or a Prohibitionist. On the contrary, he gave them roast lamb (such being the orthodox Passover dish), and finished up by passing the wine cup freely around. Jesus was from the first a striking contrast to his predecessor, John the Baptist. John came neither eating nor drinking, and the people naturally concluded he was mad. He promised them the kingdom of heaven, which, as Paul afterward explained, was not meat and drink. Jesus came eating and drinking, and they said he was "a gluttonous man, a wine-bibber, and a friend of publicans and sinners!" The Jews, like the modern Christians, were difficult to please, but if the example of Jesus means anything, no Prohibitionist or total abstainer can call himself a Christian. Jesus spake in parables to the multitude, and was himself the greatest parable of all. He claimed to be the personification of meat and drink. "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed." It was coarsely expressed, and calculated to turn the stomach of any but a born cannibal. What he would hav said, if translated into the language of common sense, amounts to this: "Here are meat and drink, and you cannot liv without them. My body is composed of one and my blood of the other. I am not an unsubstantial spirit, but a man, having the same kind of appetite as yourselvs. Eat, drink, and liv, for in these things alone you will find your salvation as long as the world shall endure." It was a sad but inevitable conclusion to the theory he had been preaching, that man could liv without work. He cannot liv without meat and drink, and to procure these he must work. The game was played out, and the last supper paid for; the exchequer was bare. Judas, the purse-bearer, like a prudent man, thinking to make the best of a bad bargain, went and sold his chief for thirty silver dollars! It was a very mean act, and expressed the utter hopelessness of the position, for what modern deacon would ruin his reputation for so paltry a sum? No doubt, many of them would sell their ministers for less—if they could find a customer. But ministers, if they hav any marketable value, usually forestall the deacons, and sell themselvs.

The savior of the world by his own showing consists of meat and drink. For these things the laborer labors, and the parson preaches. For meat and drink the land is cultivated, the ocean traversed, and the desert reclaimed. The end of the world, so confidently predicted eighteen centuries ago, is to all appearance farther off than ever. What it would hav been had the doctrins of Jesus been carried out in practice, it is impossible to say. Where would the loaves and fishes come from if there were no bakers or fishermen? Several centuries before Jesus, the Greek poet Hesiod complained that the gods had hidden the secrets of nature from mankind to compel us to work for our living, or otherwise we might realize enough food in a day to last throughout the year. Perhaps Jesus discovered the secret, but if so it died with him and has never since been found. At one time he told his disciples that he had meat to eat that they knew nothing about, and referred to the miraculous extension of the loaves and fishes as a case in point. Perhaps it was manna? I use the note of interrogation to express the word properly, for commentators tell us it implies a question equivalent to, "What is it?" Moses tells us it resembled coriander seed, and would not keep for more than a day, so that the Israelites had to liv literally "from hand to mouth." That is much the way poor people liv even in the present day, and excepting that our "daily bread" is sometimes of a doubtful character, there is nothing miraculous in it. The Israelites in the desert got nothing to drink but water, and sometimes not enough of that. Jesus was more liberal with his bill of fare. By precept and example he taught his disciples to drink wine—when they can get it. OUTIS.

Womanhood.

In reading the splendidly enthusing article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 14th headed, "The Forum," I was forcibly struck with the masculinity of the whole thing. Here and there is reference to a woman, but nearly all the persons mentioned are men, and the things done are done by men. References abound to what man has done.

One reason for this male prominence is, men are the great ruling powers at home and in public places, and usually control the purse as well as the time of the women. But the true Liberal should never neglect to note the woman-help wherever it can be brought in. Even Mrs. Freeman, though herself a woman, fails to bring into prominence such workers as Ernestine L. Rose, Frances Wright, Harriet Martineau, Lucretia Mott, Susan B. Anthony, Matilda Joslyn Gage, and a host of other Liberal women who hav pushed forward the Liberal car of progress with a success, energy, and vim that few men hav equaled and none surpassed. Were there no mottoes that could hav been quoted from this grand galaxy of women to place side by side with those from Washington, Garfield, and Grant? While I am sure there was no premeditated ignoring of woman's claims at this meeting of great magnates, I still feel that opportunities were neglected of doing a tardy justice to the mothers of reform. With Walt Whitman—

As I see my soul reflected in Nature,
As I see through the mist one with inexpressible completeness, sanity, and beauty,
I see the bent head and arms folded on the breast—
The female form I see.

Mr. Brown's Desire for Information.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I was much interested in reading an article from the pen of W. L. Willis on Spiritology, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 21st. As he knows something about this ology, you will perhaps allow me space enough to ask him a few questions regarding the spirit, or soul, or whatever he calls it—and I ask for information, not for argument.

1. What is the spirit?
2. Whence is it?
3. Where was the spirit of a person before that person was born?
4. Does the spirit of a person hav a "beginning" as an individual, personal spirit—e. g., the spirit of Mr. Smith, or Mr. Brown—the same as the body?
5. (a) If the spirit had such a beginning, will it not cease to exist, at some time, as such an individual, personal spirit (as things which hav beginning must hav ending); and (b) if so, why should it not cease to exist when the body does, i. e., at death?
6. At death, the body goes back to the elements, is dis-individualized; is it reasonable to suppose that the force still maintains its individuality?

By giving the above questions space in your interesting paper, you will greatly oblige, and perhaps lead to enlightenment. W. E. BROWN.

For Mr. and Mrs. Casey.

DEAR FRIENDS: I did not think to make another appeal for R. M. Casey and wife, but he was so anxious to earn something himself and not be dependent that he went to work while too weak and fell with his whole weight on his crippled hand and arm; so that, besides suffering the most excruciating pain, he is now once more laid up; and to cap the climax fire broke out in the forest near his little home and destroyed nearly all his wood. In fighting the fire to keep it from burning the house, his poor wife overdid and now lies very sick. I hav lent them a little money and given all I can afford, so once more ask those who feel able to send a little help. It truly seems as if misfortunes never came singly. Address R. M. Casey, Seneca, S. C., or E. D. Slenker, Snowville, Va. MRS. E. D. SLENKER.

Specimen of "Saladin's" Blasphemy.

From "God and His Book."

Your book, O Lord, I once more remind you, is terribly higgledy-piggledy and confused. I presume this results from you yourself being in a chronic state of mental confusion as to what you really are, and who you really are. Your consciousness that you are "without body, parts, or passions" must be a source of constant bewilderment to you. For "without body, parts, or passions" is the best definition of nothing divine or human ingenuity is likely to strike upon. And yet you hav a consciousness that you are not nothing. Indeed, from sundry expressions of yours I infer that you are of opinion that you are everything. Further confusion must arise from the fact of your being "one" with yourself, and the Son, and the Ghost. You will never know clearly whether you are yourself, or whether you are the Son, or whether you are the Ghost, or whether you are all three. The consciousness of this must render you confused; and, naturally enough, the confusion extends to that queer hotchpotch and salmagundi known as your Book.

Mr. Gladstone's Defense of Christianity.

The Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., occupies twenty-eight pages of the current issue of the North American Review in considering the opinions of Colonel Ingersoll concerning Christianity. The article is mostly directed against Colonel Ingersoll's Reply to Dr. Field's first letter in the Review, the subsequent "Last Word" of Dr. Field and the responsiv letter by Colonel Ingersoll not reaching him until he had made the chief part of his observations. However, Mr. Gladstone does not mind this, and, indeed, it does not impair his argument, which is, so far as it is an argument at all, a general consideration of Christianity.

The essay, we are bound to say—and in this we think everyone who reads it, Christian or heretic, will agree with us—is disappointing. Mr. Gladstone does not finish four pages before we hear the same old whine about hurting the feelings of "us Christians," and the whole essay is more a criticism of Colonel Ingersoll's method, with some incidental apologies for human sacrifice as conducted by Jehovah, than an attempt to show that Christianity is either philosophically or historically worthy of credence. Mr. Gladstone calls the controversy between Colonel Ingersoll and Dr. Field a combat in which the clash of arms is heard across the broad Atlantic, and to which we infer he has listened impatiently, longing to leap to saddle and rush to the aid of his brother Christian, whom he by implication admits has been unhorsed and rolled in the dust. But, to carry Mr. Gladstone's medieval simile a little farther and turn it upon himself, his method of meeting Colonel Ingersoll is as if all the knights who went down before the lance of Ivanhoe in the "Gentle and Joyous Passage of Arms of Ashby" had risen and said: Sir, we admit your good character, but we dislike your style of thrusting with the lance, and we deprecate the force with which you come against us. In fact, you hurt our feelings; we pray you to restrain your impetuous enthusiasm.

And Mr. Gladstone, the Sir Brian de Boisguilbert of these knights, will head the delegation of remonstrance.

Incidentally, Mr. Gladstone reaffirms the positions he maintained against Professor Huxley, "that there is no colorable ground for assuming evolution and revelation to be at variance with one another," but he contents himself with asserting instead of attempting to prove this. In the paragraphs devoted to reason, he follows Butler, and quotes copiously from the "Analogy." Design, too, he rehabilitates and leads forth, but cautiously, as if aware it is but a Rosinante of a battle steed. In fact, there is scarcely anything new in the essay. Apologies for the acts of Jephthah and Abraham, and the admission that divine government (whatever that may be) presents many and varied problems, insoluble by our understanding, hav been made before, and neither satisfy nor acquire new force coming from England's greatest Christian champion. There is also (but this is not new) a little pettifogging, a concealment of distinctions, in some of the arguments scarcely to be looked for from such a source. In his first reply to Dr. Field, Colonel Ingersoll said: "The brain thinks without asking our consent. We believe, or we disbelieve, without an effort of the will. Belief is a result. It is the effect of evidence upon the mind. The scales turn in spite of him who watches. There is no opportunity of being honest or dishonest in the formation of an opinion. The conclusion is entirely independent of desire."

After using three pages and a half to show that free will is possible, in which he follows the usual theological reasoning and falls into the usual errors by stopping short—as the Hindoos do when they come to the turtle which supports the elephant which supports Atlas who supports the world, or as do the Christians in the design argument when they get to God—at the most convenient place in his argument, and not pursuing it to a logical conclusion, Mr. Gladstone givs us these palpable non sequiturs:

"The system called Thuggism, represented in the practice of the Thugs, taught that the act, which we describe as murder, was innocent. Was this an honest error? Was it due, in its authors as well as in those who blindly followed them, to an automatic process of thought, in which the will was not consulted, and which accordingly could entail no responsibility? If it was, then it is plain that the whole foundations, not of belief, but of social morality, are broken up. If it was not, then the sweeping doctrin of the present writer on the necessary blamelessness of erroneous conclusions tumbles to the ground like a house of cards at the breath of the child who built it.

"In truth, the pages of the Reply, and the Letter which has more recently followed it, themselvs demonstrate that what the writer has asserted wholesale he overthrows and denies in detail. 'You will admit,' says the Reply (p. 477), 'that he who now persecutes for opinion's sake is infamous.' But why? Suppose he thinks that by persecution he can bring a man from soul-destroying falsehood to soul-saving truth, this opinion may reflect on his intellectual debility—but that is his misfortune, not his fault. His brain has thought without asking his consent; he has believed or disbelieved without an effort of the will (p. 476). Yet the very writer, who has thus established his title to think, is the first to hurl at him an anathema for thinking. And again, in the Letter to Dr. Field (North American Review, Vol. cxlvi, p. 33), 'the dogma of eternal pain' is described as 'that infamy of infamies.' I am not about to discuss the subject of future retribution. If I were, it would be my first duty to show that this writer has not adequately considered either the scope of his own arguments (which in no way solve the difficulties he presents) or the meaning of his words; and my second would be to recommend his perusal of what Bishop Butler has suggested on this head. But I am at present on ground altogether different. I am trying another issue. This author says we believe or disbelieve without the action of the will, and, consequently, belief or disbelief is not the proper subject of praise or blame. And yet, according to the very same authority, the dogma of eternal pain is what?—not 'an error of errors,' but an 'infamy of infamies;' and though to hold a negativ may not be a subject of moral reproach, yet to hold the affirmativ may. Truly it may be asked, Is not this a fountain which sends forth at once sweet waters and bitter?"

Mr. Gladstone does not distinguish between thought and action. Even a Thug should not be killed offhand before he has been proven to hav murdered some one. And as for the religious fanatic, no Freethinker denies his right to his belief, but denies only his right to act injuriously toward others. Torquemada was zealous in his acts and honest in belief. He is not anathematized for his thoughts, but condemned for his actions. There are in England to-day many thousands of Tories who conceive that Mr. Gladstone himself should be exterminated for the benefit of the country. If their thought were as reprehensible as action on their thought, and if the thought is entirely within their control, they ought to be proceeded against by law, for the good of society. Colonel Ingersoll does not denounce the men who hold opinions; he denounces the opinion. He does not deny the right to think wrong, but he does deny the right of anyone to interfere with another person because of that person's conformity or nonconformity with his own thought. He distinguishes between thought and action, between a dogma and the man who accepts it. He does not propose to punish the man for accepting it, because the man's mind is so constituted that he can not help his acquiescence in its tenets, but the Infidel would not allow the dogmatist to force by action his belief upon another. Action, not thoughts of action, is what men are responsible for.

We advise everyone to read Mr. Gladstone's essay, and on another page we giv as copious extracts as our space and the copyright law admit. Colonel Ingersoll does not need to write a word to convince any thinking person that Mr. Gladstone is unable to pen even a plausible defense of Christian superstition. And if he cannot, who can?

Spiritualism and Its Investigation.

We are glad to record that the two conspicuous parties in the disgraceful Diss Debar-Marsh sleight-of-hand performance which has occupied so many columns of public print and so many days of a police judge's time, are both Christians, and found their Spiritualism on the Bible. Mr. Luther R. Marsh, the victim, only a year ago read an address before the Historical society in which he took great pains to ridicule the theory of evolution, and he still adheres to Genesis as his guide in science, believes in Spiritualism as a religion, but repudiates any Spiritualism which denies the divinity of Christ, or the divine authority and authenticity of the Old and New Testaments, or revealed religion. Madam Diss Debar, too, is a firm believer in the Bible, and reads it a great deal, as was sworn in court.

In one way, we may say that the Bible and Christianity are responsible for this sleight-of-hand entertainment. Being credulous enough to believe the Bible stories of ghosts and witches, Mr. Marsh was an easy victim of another believer shrewd enough to take advantage of his credulity. If the ghost of Samuel could appear to Saul at the command of the Witch of Endor, why should not other ghosts appear at the command of Madam Diss Debar? If the Holy Ghost could materialize sufficiently to propagate a child, why should not other ghosts materialize sufficiently to paint pictures? It is this belief in ancient fables that prepares the minds of otherwise sensible men to believe the transparent trickery of unprincipled adventuresses to be solid fact. Mr. Marsh ridicules the theory of evolution, which has thousands upon thousands of undisputed facts to support it, a theory which ninety-nine out of every hundred scientific scholars believe in—and yet he possesses the most abject faith in ghosts, in the existence of which not one scholar in a hundred believes, and which alleged existence has not one undisputed fact to support it.

A writer in a daily paper, calling attention to this idiosyncrasy of the human mind, suggests three reasons why some prefer to believe in something irrational in preference to what is rational: 1. Because they reject the simple and sensible advice to "submit every article of faith (or belief) to the test of reason;" 2. Because they refuse to recognize that "vast power which works in the universe in all things by law and in none by caprice;" 3. Because we are "born and bred," or brought up to believe, to a greater or less extent, in superstition; in reverence for tradition; in a literal, rather than figurativ, interpretation of a book that we hav been taught to believe is infallible. The last of these reasons comprehends the other two. Without superstition, without the fetich book—which may be the Bible or may be some other "holy" volume—the human mind would be prepared to reason calmly upon religious questions as upon others. In his law business Mr. Marsh is exceptionally keen. There he has experience, knowledge of the law, and facts to reason from. But if his knowledge of the law had been purely guesswork; if his facts had all proven false, what cases would he hav gained? And if he had applied the same shrewd reasoning to his religion that he does to law, who does not know that the impostor would hav been defeated in her schemes?

We are sorry to see in our esteemed contemporary the Banner of Light a certificate that this Diss Debar woman's mediumship has once been genuin, whatever the present exhibition of her peculiar talents may be. The records prove her to hav always been a dishonest and mercenary adventuress, gulling credulous people by tricks of prestidigitation for the money she could make. She has used Spiritualism for her own objects, and it is more than doubtful if she herself believes in what to thousands of others is a religion. Spiritualism was not on trial with her at all, though a great many Spiritualists foolishly defended her. But Spiritualism should not be made a religion. If true, it must be in conformity with the laws of nature, and as such must come in the domain of experimental and demonstrable science. Religion is belief; Spiritualism, if true, can become knowledge. Experiments in it must be made in the same scientific spirit in which experiments are made in chemistry,

Emotion is out of place in seeking facts. Credulity should be held sternly back. Preconceived notions should be laid aside. Hope should not be allowed to see a glittering star unless that star is actually above the horizon. When a fact is thought to be discovered, it should be assailed on all sides. If it is a real fact, a truth, it will stand any test; if it is not, everyone must certainly desire it to go. Demonstrated under such conditions, Spiritualism is no more a religion than the revolutions of the planets. It is simply a fact in nature from which we can derive immeasurable joy, greater in degree, but of the same kind, as the feeling which takes possession of us when a loved one thought dead has been restored to life.

And, speaking of Spiritualism and the investigation of its phenomena, we may add that next week we shall print an account of Mr. William Henry Burr's researches in independent slate-writing, at the conclusion of which he avows that he is "firmly convinced that there must hav been an intelligent force that produced the writing on those slates." Mr. Burr means, of course, an intelligent force apart and not of or from the medium, or any other human being.

The Woman's Congress and the Methodists.

The leading communication in this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER is the very able and altogether admirable paper read by Helen Gardener at the recent Woman's International Council in Washington. Miss Gardener does her sex credit in all that she undertakes, whether polemical or scientific, and not the weakest reason why woman should be enfranchised is the absurd fact that the author of such a paper as "Sex in Brain" is deprived of all right to participate in governmental affairs, while a Roman Catholic male, who probably could not define two words in a hundred of the essay, or comprehend a single one of the many ideas it advances, is allowed as a lord of creation to cast a ballot and hold office and manage the affairs of the state.

In writing of the Woman's Council two weeks ago, we made an error which we are now pleased to correct. Freethought ideas were not entirely suppressed at the congress, and their non-appearance in the reports is due to the exertions of Frances Willard, who captured the reportorial youths, told them Sunday-school stories, and induced them to be good little boys for a while and leave out all the naughty heresy of the Infidel women. Therefore, only the pious orations of the sophomorical young women in graduating dresses were reported. But Miss Gardener's paper is to be printed at the expense of the suffrage organization and distributed as a campaign argument, and the writer can console herself with the knowledge that few other essays were considered of sufficient merit to be so preserved and circulated. At the conclusion of the congress a meeting of Infidel women was called by Mrs. Stanton, Helen Gardener, Mrs. Dilke, and Mrs. Scatchard, and twenty-seven of the brainiest delegates responded, among them Matilda Joslyn Gage, Mrs. Miner, Judge Waite's wife, Mrs. Westendorf, Mrs. and Miss Southworth, Miss Law, and Madam Bogelot, delegate from Paris, which we regard as a cheering indication that in the Woman Suffrage movement there is a Liberal element bound to hav its say. This element defeated Miss Frances Willard's intention to commit the council by resolution to Prohibition, God-in-the-Constitution, and other Christian schemes, and to elect for the next international council officers known and activ as Christian workers. Miss Willard, who openly declared that she would vote only for such, was prevailed upon by Mrs. Scatchard, the ablest of the foreign delegates, to cast her ballot for Mrs. Fassett, of England, an avowed Atheist, for the president of the next international council, which will be held in London three years hence, and Mrs. Stanton peremptorily sat upon the pious resolutions. Helen Gardener, an official visitor and not a delegate, did her share of work for Liberalism, and though the Christians had a majority of votes, they were rendered unable to take advantage of their power. Miss Willard's influence was perceptibly weakened by her declaration that at heart she is not a suffragist, but sees that by woman's vote she can effect the pious and prohibitory legislation she seeks. She counts upon casting the female vote solid for the church, and before all else she is a Methodist of Methodists.

Bearing these things in mind, we hope that she feels proud of the church for which she is working so hard as president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, now that its chief officers and most important official organ are endeavoring with all the skill they possess to keep woman delegates out of the general conference now in session in this city. There are few men in the Methodist church who hav done so much for that sect as Miss Willard. This is well enough, perhaps, for a duplication of Miss Willard's fanaticism, bigotry, intolerance, and general determination to run the country in the interest of religion is not to be desired. But, nevertheless, the ones who do the work, the practical standard-bearers of any cause, are the ones who should be honored by their followers, and whose voices should be heard in its counsels, even if they are so fortunate as to be women. The Methodist clergy, however, are fully convinced that woman is an inferior creature, and being such shall hav no vote as to who shall be her bishop, or preacher, or how the money she has coaxed from her male acquaintances for the church shall be expended. The arguments on the admission of female delegates to the conference are excessivly warm, very one-sided, and as bigoted as one of Miss Willard's own speeches. Their general tenor is that woman has risen about as high in the church as it is safe for the brethren to allow, and to yield her the right to participate in the supreme council of the church would be dangerous to religion. Therefore, let her be subject to her husband in everything, as the church is subject to Christ.

If the women who hav been for years the chief support of the ecclesiastical system known as Methodism would only read and ponder over the treatment they hav invariably and universally received from the ecclesiastical machine, there would hav been many more delegates at the Woman's Congress, and several times twenty-seven at the meeting of the Infidels.

Colonel Billings Convicted.

Most of our readers know that last winter M. E. Billings, of Waverly, Ia., compiler of the "Crimes of Preachers," was lodged in jail charged with shooting W. S. Kingsley, attorney of Bremer county, a former friend of Mr. Billings, and an estimable young man. We hav refrained from saying anything of the case, for while we know from experience with Mr. Billings, both business and in connection with a congress of the American Secular Union, that he is not the honorable gentleman he ought to be, we did not wish to do him any injustice; and though the murder charge and the matters that led to it appeared very dark, we gave him the benefit of the doubt. His trial, which lasted from April 3d to the 25th, is now ended, and the verdict is murder in the second degree.

Colonel Billings is about fifty-two years old; has an enviable war record; is a strong character, but pompous and egotistic, and unscrupulous in his dealing. Some thirteen years ago he quietly, and many think unjustly, divorced his wife, after which he eloped with his present wife, who figures conspicuously and disgracefully in this trouble, then a schoolgirl of some fourteen years of age. Kingsley was a general favorit in Waverly. He bought Billings's property a year ago, and the two men occupied the same office for some time. They fell out, however, although neither would tell the cause of the disagreement. Billings left for Dakota, but came back on the day of the shooting, and, it is said, attempted to extort money from Kingsley. Billings charged Kingsley with intimacy with a young woman named Emma Shaw, and attempted to force Kingsley to deed back his property. Miss Shaw testified to the falsity of the charge.

The story of the tragedy, as told in the World, and substantiated by other accounts, is briefly that on the evening of December 21, 1887, at a few minutes before 6 o'clock, two pistol shots were heard in quick succession in the office of the county attorney. Colonel Billings staggered down the stairway with a cry of pain, and called out that he was shot, and that he had the documents in his pocket to show why Kingsley had attempted to kill him. A clerk in the store below, who had passed quickly up the stairs after Billings's exit, announced that Kingsley was dying in his office. The rooms occupied by the county attorney were divided by folding doors, which were swung open, and just within the rear apartment lay the body of the young county attorney, the blood oozing from a bullet-wound over his right eye. A pistol lay by his right side, while tightly grasped in his right hand was an unfinished letter to an old college chum. He died in a few moments without regaining consciousness. Billings was taken to a doctor's office, and his wound examined. A bruise was found in the center of his back, while upon the broken ring of his suspenders was found a flattened bullet. While at the office of the doctor he was arrested and conveyed to jail.

It was at first supposed that Kingsley had committed suicide, thinking he had killed Colonel Billings, but at the coroner's inquest an infamous plot was laid bare. In Colonel Billings's pockets were found papers that showed that he had intended to force Kingsley to become his slave for the rest of his life. Among the papers which he had prepared for Kingsley to sign was a confession on the part of Kingsley that he had been intimate with Billings's wife; forged affidavits of responsible persons that they had witnessed their criminal relations; a confession of the wife herself; a forged information before a justice of the peace charging Kingsley with this crime, and deeds, notes, and mortgages which not only conveyed to Billings the possession of all of Kingsley's earthly possessions at that time, but gave him power to draw Kingsley's salary until the year 1890. The trial developed and emphasized the fact of a conspiracy. At the inquest Colonel Billings was kept in ignorance of the testimony of other witnesses, and when confronted with it contradicted the statements he made after the death of Kingsley. On the trial his wife also changed her story. Upon the witness-stand she told of her alleged intimacy with Kingsley with much particularity of detail, but on the days when she said it occurred it was proved that neither she nor Kingsley were at the house named. One of her letters to Kingsley was found, in which she stated that her husband was away for two days, but that she feared he suspected them. Kingsley's reply, written upon the bottom of the letter, was that of an innocent man. He was puzzled, he said, to know why she wrote him such a letter, and wanted to know what her husband could suspect them of doing. Mrs. Billings testified that after yielding to Kingsley her conscience smote her, and she confessed all to her wronged husband, who was overpowered with grief, though so great was his love for her that he deeded all of his worldly possessions to her, telling her that he himself would go away and become a wanderer upon the face of the earth, while she, if she wished, could marry Kingsley, and perhaps be happy. Of course she remonstrated against this plan, but the next day, strange as it may appear, the ruined husband invited Kingsley to dinner and left him alone with his wife. Billings testified that, having become convinced that Kingsley had been intimate with his wife, he had resolved that Kingsley should bind himself to support her, hence the notes, mortgages, etc., found upon him. He himself intended to go away and commit suicide. The notes were made payable to him as attorney. His wife, he repeatedly averred, knew nothing of the transactions. The hole through the back of Billings's clothing, where the bullet was supposed to hav entered, was shown to hav been made with a sharp instrument, and the bullet itself had been welded on the buckle of his suspenders with a hammer. The ownership of the revolver found in Kingsley's hand has not been traced to Billings, but it was proved that Kingsley had never owned one, while Billings owned several.

Such is the painful story of the downfall of an able man, and one widely known among Liberals. Happily, it is the first of the kind. We hav received letters from some friends alleging that Colonel Billings was being persecuted because of his Infidelity. This we hav not believed. While it seemed incomprehensible that he could commit murder, we do know him capable of forging letters and of unfair business transactions. It is probable that the religious press will taunt the Freethinkers with this conviction, but in our judgment they should keep quiet, for the crime committed by Colonel Billings does not impair the accuracy of the statistics he collected. But it is a sad case, ruining a woman's reputation, destroying a home, and adding to the population of a penitentiary, where few Freethinkers indeed are found. It's too bad, too bad.

C. B. REYNOLDS has postponed his California and Northwestern lecturing engagements to go down to Phenix, Arizona, and debate with some Christians of local notoriety. Corrected outline of his route will be given shortly.

Letters from Friends.

ONTARIO, CAL., April 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I beg to be excused for my delay in sending remittance. It was not for want of appreciation for your paper, as my husband's request in regard to it was, "Take it always, as I want my children to hav a chance to learn for themselvs the truth." My husband died the 29th of December, of lingering consumption, having been ill five years. As long as he was able he read your paper and advocated Freethought, and as long as he was able to listen I read to him. He did all he could, and I ask our Freethought friends to kindly remember us, and if any of you all come to California, I hope to meet you. My house will be free to all speakers or laborers in the good fight. My husband wished to be remembered to the friends who hav heard from him through your columns. AUGUSTA A. JOHNS.

MORRISTOWN, MINN., March 18, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I write to let you know that our Rice county S. M. R. Association is doing a good, successful work, and I would be glad to see all other counties in this and other states organize in the same manner—that is, by local clubs, to meet weekly, and the members of the clubs to meet monthly. We find it an efficient means of cultivating home talent and Liberal ideas, and of raising the necessary funds to carry on the war. We started in by employing a good agent at $30 a month salary, who is kept busy attending each club once a week, by which he has no expense for hotel bills or horse feed, and can do well on small salary. Our call for donations of Liberal papers has been responded to from the north, south, east, and west so liberally that our agent has more than he can distribute. And as it is necessary to support our Liberal press, we believe it will be better for our members to subscribe for Liberal papers than to be supplied with free donations; consequently, we do not want any more packages donated. D. BIRDSALL, Cor. Sec.

COPPERFIELD MINING AND SMELTING CO.,
COPPERFIELD, VT., April 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: This place, you will see by the above, is now called Copperfield—formerly Ely. It has lain in the hands of a receiver since 1883. It was sold at public auction January 12, 1888, for $36,000, to F. M. F. Cazin, of New York, who is now general superintendent and secretary. He has in years past contributed to THE TRUTH SEEKER "Tell-Tale to Freethinkers," and "Was Napoleon a Freethinker?" etc. This copper mine has stood second in this country, and only failed by mismanagement. They are now putting in electric lights so as to run the old dumps to a new concentrator day and night. We expect to see it booming again.

Under the old order the Methodists predominated. From curiosity I attended one of their evening meetings, and of all howlings, screaming, and lowing it was a holy terror—a shame and disgrace to the present civilization. But under the new management we expect to see a school of science, as the Freethinkers appear to predominate.

Respectfully yours, ETHAN DIMOND.

SANTA BARBARA, CAL., April 9, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Putnam was here yesterday (Sunday), and spoke in the afternoon on "The American Republic," and in the evening on "The New Heaven and Earth." He made many points against the now existing and further proposed union of church and state, points of vital interest to every man, woman, and child in the land. He proved all that has been said in his praise for eloquence, clearness, and, best of all, solid logic, on the issues of future political and social development, pointing to the dangers and promises that hover over us all, awaiting the judgment of the individual with his vote, who, many times multiplied, finally counts the majority for weal or woe. He aroused our sluggish sense of responsibility to healthy action in the matters of daily life, portraying, by defining the rights and wrongs of the individual, our incapability to at all times know at a mere surface glance whether a word or act applies only to unimportant matters or involves a principle to ignore which is to indirectly do a wrong to all our fellows.

On learning at the evening lecture that the speaker only allowed God equality with other persons, and so entitled only to one vote, a half-dozen or so of the audience, with flashing eyes and angry scowls, left the hall, and also the speaker and the unthrown lamps to giv further light to the more appreciating ones remaining. Yours for more Putnams,

MRS. D. MARIAGER.

OKETO, KAN., April 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: So long as THE TRUTH SEEKER maintains its present unbiased position on all questions, social, political, or ethical, you may count me a subscriber.

I think that Freethought has made gratifying growth in this county the last year.

I see some of our Nebraska Freethinkers take exception to the idea advanced by some that the Prohibition party is a silent partner of the God-in-the Constitution Company. I think if they lived in Kansas they would hold different opinions. During the past year the Women's Christian Temperance Union caused to be published in the county papers their determination to prosecute all violators of the Sunday laws; but their notice called forth so many articles from the Freethinkers of the county that they wisely concluded that they had reckoned without their host, and as yet no prosecutions hav been made, to my knowledge.

I cannot close without offering my thanks to Dr. Brooks for his reply to Professor Denslow. Such articles as the professor's may suit shylocks, coupon-clippers, and Wall street brokers, but such sophisms are not readily assimilated by the sturdy yeomen of the West. I very much regret that such an able Freethinker should use his pen to extenuate or defend the present system of spoliation and robbery whereby ninety-five per cent of the human family are doomed to life-long drudgery and toil that five per cent may revel in luxury. The title, Might is Right, would hav been more appropriate for his essay. JOHN A. MAYHEW.

COALING, ALA., April 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to notice Mrs. H. A. Ritchey's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 31st. I presume she is orthodox and takes a stand against Freethinkers about evolution. I think it, as well as Genesis, a hypothesis; but I want to ask her, if she had never seen a copy of the New Testament, would she ever infer from the Old that she would ever liv again? Would she not think all the rewards and punishments were to be here? The Pharisees believed only in the transmigration of souls, and the Sadducees thought death ended all. Now, if these sects, and the learning of the nation, too, failed to find a future life in the Old Testament, may we not believe that the New was borrowed from the heathen, as they had their hell and heaven and future life in full blast thousands of years before Christ? Where did they get it? Not from the God of the Hebrews.

I will ask Mrs. Richey to read Num. xxxi, where an industrious, peaceable, and virtuous nation was put to the sword, and the watchword was Booty and beauty.

I distribute my papers and books all round and send my papers as far as one hundred miles. People down here hav never so much as heard of Freethought. If you could get a lecturer to pass South, it would be a good investment. The Christians giv me a dark time. As soon as I get one to subscribe they bring all their influence to bear on him and tell him he won't be allowed his oath, and will ruin his family. Do send a lecturer down so as to agitate and make it general. H. J. WARD.

LAWRENCE, KAN., March 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I send a few words in the memory of a friend: In memorial for William J. Christie, who lost his life by drowning in the Columbia river, in April last, age twenty years. He was an activ Freethinker and an ardent reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He was a most remarkable boy, being born and raised by strict Presbyterian parents, yet having already broken off the shackles of superstition. It is a great calamity when our young soldiers in the Liberal ranks drop away, for their work is not yet ended. But, alas! the brightest star fades the soonest.

LINES ON HIS DEATH.

Sleep on sweetly, kindest William,
In the grave were thou art gone,
For thy work in life is ended,
And thy glory just begun.

In this world of strife and conflict
Thou didst do a noble deed
To emerge from superstition,
In which thou wast born indeed.

Long in memory we shall cherish
All your grand and lofty thoughts.
But, alas! for death did shorten,
Works so true and earnest sought.

Farewell, William, we do miss you,
For we see you here no more;
We shall meet you, we shall greet you,
On that far-off brighter shore.

MRS. CHARLOTTE PALM.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, April 1, 288.

C. B. REYNOLDS, Dear Friend and Brother: In my TRUTH SEEKER of March 31st I find a short but pointed article from you. It not only surprised, but saddened me beyond measure—not that your hard, unjust words touched me because I am a Spiritualist, but from the fact that a person who has had the serious experience you hav just passed through with fanatics and bigots in New Jersey would turn around and hurl his barbed shafts of ridicule and sarcasm at a large class of people who are just as honest and conscientious in their lives as you are, and who, when you were in trouble, gave you sympathy, and more, material aid. It seems to me it would be much better policy for us as reformers to stand shoulder to shoulder and back to back, our weapons pointed at our common enemy, ignorance and superstition, instead of, like a blind, vicious mule, kicking without rhyme or reason because 'tis our nature to kick, often hurting our best friends.

Surely your opportunities for studying different grades of Spiritualists must hav been limited, or you could not hav dumped us without reservation into such an indiscriminate "soft-brained" mass; from which I beg leave to crawl, but after I get out I shall not turn and throw dirt into some of my friends' faces because our brains did not happen to be cast in the same mold, or, if they were, hav been touched by the sunshine and shadow of different forces and conditions, and truth has assumed for them, as it does for us all, the form it must.

I most earnestly protest against being classed among that class of Spiritualists or Materialists (and no ist or ism has a monopoly of either "insanity" or fanaticism) who believe in legislating morality or anything else into humanity. I but voice the sentiments of thousands when I say that our belief in immortality makes us better able to cope with the vicissitudes and problems of life. Our aim, like your own, is to try to make the world a little better for our having lived in it. Personally, I liv for this world. I hav never had any use for lawyer, preacher, or doctor in my life; I hav no god but nature, no savior but myself. What fault hav you to find with my creed? I trust you will not resent being so familiarly addressed by one of those poor, deluded creatures upon whom you so freely poured out your pity and contempt. I assure you I do not need either. I would like to think that in the near future you will grow to see that your words to which I refer were unkind and uncalled-for from one who is a champion of toleration, free thought, and free speech. Respectfully your friend, M. M. REED.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., April 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: O. S. Barrett announces himself as a disabled soldier. On this ground, but not otherwise, his letter about the Anarchists is entitled to respectful reading. There is a bee in Barrett's bonnet. Anarchists, he says, are thieves, murderers, robbers, non-workers, a bad element generally, without any honor or other feeling than for themselvs. When one is wounded the others tear and rend him. They believe in the big dog chewing the little dog. Anarchy is something for nothing. They know no moral principles. They are strangers to conscience. Blood, rapine, and plunder is their motto. They are cowards, too, take a secret course, cannot be trusted, are treacherous. I hav not exhausted Barrett's vocabulary, but I respect your space. How does Mr. Barrett know all this? How many Anarchists is he acquainted with? Was it cowardice or want of feeling for any but himself which made the brave Parsons return to Chicago and giv himself up to be hanged with his comrades? Where are the Anarchists who helped to tear and rend him? Was it a secret course to publish the Alarm in Chicago? Does the man who bids mortal defiance to our overgrown corporations and the powerful government which they control appear to believe in the big dog chewing the little dog? About all collateral questions Mr. Barrett shows himself either much wiser than many well-informed people, or else unusually ignorant. He says there are plenty of broad acres to be had for the occupancy. Will he please state where? He must hav been asleep for five-and-twenty years. He can see no reason for any trouble in this liberal country. Heywood, Walker, Harman, Lant, Bennett, could. He is sure the Anarchists had an impartial trial. Trumbull, McAllister, Butler, Ingersoll, all lawyers of some eminence, thought differently. But there is one easy explanation of Mr. Barrett's superior information. He reads the Freethinkers' Magazine! C. L. JAMES.

CALVERT, TEX., April 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: For the last eight or ten days our little community has been considerably stirred up by a novel and arrogant Baptist revivalist, whose egotistical claim consists in an assumed knowledge that very few, if any at all, of the old Baptists in the world hav any rightful claim to Christianity, because they hav never been baptized in conformity with the teachings of Christ. He warns them to be so baptized without further delay, otherwise their chances to a seat on the heavenly throne will be very hotly contested; and the result of this new discovery has created a perfect consternation among this saintly flock. Men, women, and children against whose claims to Christianity doubting Thomases would hav fared badly are again offering themselvs on the borders of the saintly fount, each claiming precedence for a plunge in its troubled water, lest he be too late to avoid the awful crisis. Wives, whose husbands hav not entirely recovered from this surprise, are found seeking immediate salvation at the hands of this unexpected vicegerent of God, the husband asking in unmistakable tones: "Is it true that my wife has always been on the brink of hell? Is it true that my dear wife, whose Christian claims hav never been questioned, is now found to be ranked among those for whom the fires of damnation are already kindled? May God hav mercy upon us all!"

Such, however, is the teaching of this innovator, and I assure you that his converts are numbered by the scores, and promis to continue till the entire flock is washed anew. A man with such influence over an intelligent people one would naturally suppose was possessed of great brain power and unqualified ability, yet I positivly declare him to be ignorant, self-contradictory, and entirely void of any talent necessary to constitute an ordinary cross-roads preacher. O religion! thou art a jewel!

Liberals are scarce here. Among three thousand souls can be numbered three Liberals, all told. Thus you see churches hav full sway here, and were it not for the constant fight continually waging among themselvs our little number would not last long. But our safety rests in their continual warfare, they thus getting no time to fight Infidelity.

L. A. BERGERON.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., March 24, 288.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been up and made a nine weeks' stay with the Concordia folks, canvassing for books, and I hav proof positiv that Mr. J. M. Hagaman has done some valiant work, for when I come in contact with the pious they set up a howl grievous to be heard against the "old man"—his name being among the number that headed my list. And I am sorry to say that some of the Liberals of the place had fallen into the same habit, so I made up my mind I was going to see what terrible thing the "old man" had done. So after that, when they began to tell what a mean man Brother Hagaman was, I would say: "What has he done? Come, tell us all about it." They would begin to stutter and say, "W-h-y, he opposes our church." "Is that all?" "W-h-y, I can't say but what he is a good neighbor and citizen." I said in reply: "Now, you do Mr. Hagaman a very great injustice by leading strangers in your town to believe he is 'an awful wicked man,' when your very next expression upsets your first allegation, which had nothing but assertion for its foundation, and had I been content with your bare statement, it would hav left a bad impression as to Mr. Hagaman, and also would not hav left you in the category of convicting yourself out of your own mouth of a slanderous charge against the character of a citizen, estimable, as you hav already confessed. If a good neighbor and citizen doesn't constitute a good person, pray, what does? The fact is, because Mr. Hagaman has been true to his convictions and opposed the doctrins of your church, which he has a perfect right to do, you hav willfully slandered him."

This is not written in vindication of Mr. Hagaman, but to warn Liberals to be careful how they fall into the habit of denouncing anyone because somebody else has done so. Always investigate first, or hold your tongue. It is also written to show how unprincipled some Christians are.

I did not fail to try and do some work for the old standard-bearer THE TRUTH SEEKER. When I left I had a club of three willing to take it a year, and as there was a fair prospect of getting more, I left the work in the hands of a Mr. Scott.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

BARRE, MASS., April 23, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to express my unqualified approbation of Major Powell's address on "Evolution in Civilized Man," in your last issue; and also return thanks to the Editor for the pleasure of its perusal.

I cannot forbear particularizing one very fine point on page 246, second column, where the lecturer introduces the marriage institution as a proof that "the highest civilization is reached where man marries the woman of his choice on the sole condition that he is the man of her choice, and where the man must hav but one wife, and the woman but one husband, and the twain are one in love, in purpose, and in law."

The lecturer also shows that the lower evolutions between the sexes, where man fought with man for possession of the female, each tended to elevate him, and the relation of the sexes, into this higher civilization; also, "the way from communal marriage to monogamy and personal choice is very long, but every step in it has been taken by man in his endeavor to secure greater happiness."

Such views as the above, Mr. Editor, are elevating, because truthful, practical, and beneficent in their results on individuals and to communities.

"Nature was ever a deceiver and a cheat," says Major Powell. True, alas, too true, and yet many of our Liberals are ever lauding "good old Mother Nature," as if she did not produce all the devastations and was not responsible for all the evils Christians ascribe to their God.

Permit me, farther, to call attention to T. E. Longshore's article, "Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." The idea, though not new, that Christ was an inward principle—truth—not a person, I consider strictly correct. "Christ in you, the hope of glory" (Col. i, 27). This Christ within was to be the savior, not a person outside, a man or God, through an atoning sacrifice. So was the Holy Ghost, the Holy Spirit, a condition of the mind, not a person. But thus has priestcraft perverted all truth for the sake of filthy lucre, power, and preferment.

The author of "Spiritology," in the same issue—April 21st—inquires, "What kind of truth seekers are they who refuse to investigate spirit phenomena, and close their eyes, ears, and reason to this knowledge of spirit life?" He then goes on to answer his own question by saying, "Any Materialist who refuses to investigate this science of Spiritology is very much like the pious Christian who refuses to see the self-contradictions, the sanction of vice and crime, and the unscientific teachings in his sacred book."

Mr. Willis must not infer that all who do not believe, or "know," as he affirms he does, "refuse" to investigate Spiritology. As for myself, I hav had this wonderful phenomena accompany me all my life, and, since 1851, hav been subject to nearly every phase of genuin so-called modern mediumship; and yct I am an unbeliever in its spirit origin. But it is not because I am ignorant of its nature, for it has invested me all my life, as before stated, and, as I am never entranced, I claim to hav investigated it, somewhat, in the last thirty-seven years. Now, may not many truth seekers and Materialists hav investigated as honestly as I hav and failed to come into the "knowledge" of which Mr. Willis boasts?

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1 for Voltaire's "Romances." I hav not been a subscriber very long yet, but I expect in a short time to send in a small club. I hav found your paper to be both instructiv and interesting reading. Heston's cartoons are excellent object-lessons.

C. B. Reynolds descended on a portion of Kansas at the same time that a full-grown blizzard made itself known. The former left the state and turned it over to the blizzards and the preachers on condition that they raise enough hell-fire to the surface to make it comfortably warm for him when he makes his return trip. No, Mr. Reynolds, Kansas is not a barren desert, but a rich and fertil prairie.

In your issue of March 10th Mr. N. D. Goodell, of Sacramento, Cal., is surprised that so much sympathy is expressed for the poor, deluded Anarchists that were hanged in Chicago, and he feels a stigma on his character because some of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav been allowed to express their views in regard to the unjust and defiant position taken by the Illinois courts. Does Mr. Goodell not know that the Illinois courts did not claim that the men who were hanged threw the bomb or knew who threw the bomb? If they did not throw or know who threw the bomb, then they could not hav been hanged for murder or for being parties to a murder. If they were not hanged for murder, which they were not, then they were hanged for expressing their opinions in public, and if hanging does not put a throttle on free speech, then what does? And yet Mr. Goodell says that we hav free speech, if we keep within the limits of the law. The fact that there is limit is proof enough that speech is not absolutely free. All the monarchies in Europe can say as much, even Russia. Mr. Goodell says that those men were Anarchists, and that Anarchy means, to destroy all laws and government. I am not an Anarchist, and do not positivly know what their theories are, but as nearly as I can make out extracts of their code, they believe in a perfect brotherhood connected by ties of blood, and that a government should rule by love instead of force. These doctrins are not bad because they are impracticable under the present civilization. Mr. Goodell says that there is not one man out of a thousand that has a capacity for business, and he wants to know how all can be equally rich. In regard to this I will say that, this being a government of the people, we should enact laws to protect the thousand who hav no business capacity from becoming victims to the one who has a business capacity.

Mr. Goodell cites the five men who formed a corporation with a capital of $300,000 to build the Central Pacific railroad, and says that their business capacity was the secret of their success. He wants to know: "Where is the Anarchist that will say that these men should be put down and their property destroyed, even though they are worth from ten to twenty millions each?" Let us see about it. These men started out twenty-five years ago with $300,000. The interest on this for twenty-five years at twelve per cent would be only $900,000; and this is too high, according to Ingersoll. He says no legitimate business will pay ten per cent on capital invested, except love. Allowing them a salary of $25,000 a year each, which will make a sum of $3,125,000 more, we see that if these men had been engaged in a legitimate business, they would not hav been worth more than $4,025,000 to-day, instead of $75,000,000; which shows that these men hav got over $70,000,000 of the people's money. And yet he advises them to be prudent in their expenditure. The question is, if the law protects one who is physically weak against a big, robust bully, why should not the law protect one who is financially weak against the big financial bully who seeks to destroy him?

F. O. HELLSTROM.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: With your permission, I will make a brief reply to Mrs. H. A. Ritchey's letter which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 31st.

She asks: "Why should an unintelligent nature decree that, whereas the law is everywhere else universal that cold contracts and heat expands, in water this law should be reversed and cold be made to expand?"

On page 116 of the Humboldt Library (No. 2), Professor Tyndall, in commenting upon what Count Rumford has to say upon "design in nature," says: "We are here warned of the fact, which is too often forgotten, that the pleasure or comfort of a belief, or the warmth and exaltation of feeling which it produces, is no guarantee of its truth. For the whole of Count Rumford's delight and enthusiasm in connection with this subject, and the whole of his ire against those who did not share his opinions, were founded upon an erroneous notion.

"Water is not a solitary exception to an otherwise general law. There are other molecules than those of this liquid which require more room in the solid crystalline state than in the adjacent molten condition. Iron is a case in point. Solid iron floats upon molten iron exactly as ice floats upon water. Bismuth is a still more impressiv case, and we could shiver a bomb as certainly by the solidification of bismuth as by that of water."

On page 92 the professor says: "It is worth pausing to think what wonderful work is going on in the atmosphere during the formation and descent of every snow-shower! What building power is brought into play, and how imperfect seem the productions of human minds and hands when compared with those formed by the blind forces of nature! But who ventures to call the forces of nature blind? In reality, when we speak thus we are describing our own condition. The blindness is ours. But while we thus acknowledge our limits, there is also reason for wonder at the extent to which science has mastered the system of nature. From age to age, and from generation to generation, fact has been added to fact, and law to law, the true method and order of the universe being thereby more and more revealed. In doing this science has encountered and overthrown various forms of superstition and deceit, of credulity and imposture."

In relation to the laws of inheritance and variation of which Mrs. Ritchey speaks, I will say that they hav not ceased to be; they are in full force and operation to-day, and man has been able to detect them to quite an extent. All geologists and those who hav read geology without prejudice admit that vast changes hav taken place upon the surface of this earth since life began. Mrs. Ritchey also says that geologists hav calculated that this earth has not been in a fit state for plants and animals long enough for this hypothetical system of evolution to accomplish its work of development. Professor Huxley in speaking upon this subject says: "It is a matter of fact that the equine forms which I hav described to you occur in the order stated, in the Tertiary formations. But I hav not the slightest means of guessing whether it took a million of years, or ten millions, or a hundred millions, or a thousand millions of years to giv rise to that series of changes. The geologist, considering the rate at which deposits are formed and the rate at which denudation goes on upon the surface of the earth, arrives at more or less justifiable conclusions as to the time which is required for a deposit of a certain thickness of rock, and if he tells me that the Tertiary formations required five hundred millions of years for their deposit, I suppose he has good ground for what he says; and I take that as a measure of the duration of the evolution of the horse from the Orohippus up to its present condition. And, if he is right, undoubtedly evolution is a very slow process." He also says that by select breeding structural differences in animals can be produced, as great as those in distinct species. Several kinds of doves, a new kind of dog in England, and the Jersey cow hav all been produced during the historic period. Everything is undergoing continual change; nothing has an absolute existence.

Tyndall says that "life and the conditions of life are in necessary harmony." Two species of animals, the great Irish elk and the dodo, hav disappeared during the historic period; wonder if God is displeased about it; think he will recreate them?

LYMAN SMITH.

EAST RANDOLPH, N. Y., March 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Through the kindness of Mr. O. H. Burt, of this "city between the hills," where two white-necktied shepherds are engaged to watch over the spiritual welfare of their meager flocks, I had the good fortune to be loaned THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I can assure you I enjoyed the intellectual treat tremendously. It was rather amusing to see how some of your able letter-writers handled the white-winged paupers of the skies with gloves off. I hav often listened to Bible-bangers who, with an eloquence equal to a fog-horn, state "that civilization is due to the Bible and the church." But every student of history knows they lie when they make such an unwarrauted statement. The right climate and soil hav had more to do with "civilization" than all the preachers living and dead. We hav often heard "that those nations which hav had the Bible were refined, civilized, and learned." Look at the Egyptian cities; look at Greece, see the proud position she attained to.

Do not forget the fact that it is less than three hundred years since Christianity compelled woman to sell her virtue. Wives in England were bought from the fifth to the eleventh century. "Civilization"—bah! In England as late as the seventeenth century husbands whipped their wives. "Gentlemen" thought it a pleasure to witness the flogging of women at Bridewell. It was not until 1817 that the public whipping of women was abolished in England—where John L. Sullivan got "thumped" a few days ago.

The forced degradation of woman was made a revenue to the church—"Christianity began woman's degradation." Please read Lecky's "History of European Morals." Henry III., bishop of Liege, boasted at a public banquet that in twenty-two months he had fourteen children born to him. One hundred thousand women in England were made dissolute by the clergy (Draper's "Intellectual Development of Europe"). Great "civilization," eh?

It is very queer that after the women find out that the church has been their worst enemy, they countenance it, yet seven-eighths of her members are women. Every dollar paid to support lazy sky-pilots degrades women; every cent you invest in "another world" is lost; every moment you spend mooning about heaven and its angels with harps is time lost forever. Attend to business here; we cannot do justice to two worlds at the same time.

Easter Sunday, two choirs and Hall's full orchestra charmed the ears of a large audience in this place at the Union church. Rev. J. J. Hancock was the "biggest cock" of the occasion. "A Visit to the Tomb of Christ," and "Life and Light Through the Resurrection," were his subjects morning and evening—and what the clergyman didn't know is past finding out. Yet, notwithstanding the attendance Sunday, the church and its members are dying of the dry rot, and the brainy members hav given the church the go by.

Do not talk to me about civilization! Shame on you, you should go and hide your head from the gaze of men. Your own history reveals your bloody deeds and awful wrongs committed. Justice is unknown to some of your Christian priests. Before our eyes arises the beautiful and learned Hypatia, dragged naked through the streets of Alexandria and foully murdered by priests. I see the flames enveloping the body of Bruno; Galileo we see crouched upon a dungeon floor; I listen to piteous groans of burning Servetus; and the cries of wives and children cause the sky to weep in sorrow and pity for the wrong done them. If you read "Romanism As It Is," by Rev. Samuel W. Barnum, you will be, I think, convinced that the Christian religion has caused more sorrow than joy. In 1481 298 "new Christians" were burnt alive in the city of Seville, 2,000 burnt in other parts of Andalusia, and 17,000 more subjected to various penalties. Civilization! Let us enter a dungeon, or rather sixty of them. Oh, what sights! Old men and women with their arms fastened tight behind them, weights to their feet; we see them drawn off the damp dungeon floor by means of a pulley; see them suspended for some time, suddenly let down with a jerk, dislocating their joints. This torture was continued just to please the Inquisitors as long as the strength of the sufferer seemed capable to endure. Beautiful girls, pure as light and as stainless as a star, are subjected to all the fiendish tortures a depraved mind can think of. A brisk fire awaits your darling girl. Who, with tender sympathies, can witness what she must suffer? We see her nude; see her stretched upon a cold, damp dungeon floor, her arms and limbs tied together; see the soles of her tender feet rubbed with lard and placed close to the fire; see her tormentors pour vitriol on her white arms; see it eating into her flesh; see her toe-nails pulled out with red-hot pincers, her golden hair pulled out by the roots, and into her bright brown eyes we see boiling lead poured. "Giv her more pain!" shouts a judge, who does not seem satisfied with the doom of his miserable victim. The poor girl, she is dead now! Her agony is ended, but the judges order her thrown into a hot caldron of tar; we see the flesh melt from her bones like snow on the lips of a volcano. Not content with their fiendish work, they order her now fleshless bones thrown into a pit of quicklime. O you fiends! you monsters of our race! you retarders of progress! Can you call this "civilization?" Colonel Lemanouski and his French troops destroyed the Inquisition near Madrid in 1809. He found decaying and decayed bodies still chained, the living, suffering, of every age and of both sexes, from the young man and maiden to those of threescore and ten years, all as naked as when they were born into the world, and the instruments of torture of every kind which the ingenuity of men or devils could invent. Yet you talk about your "civilization."

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Win and Wear.

There's no royal road to greatness—
Men must ever climb to fame;
All the wealth in misers' coffers
Wouldn't buy a deathless name.
Is a noble goal before you?
Would you great achievements dare?
Brother, then be up and doing—
Brother! you must "Win and Wear."

Toil and labor—never stopping
Till you make the prize your own;
For you know 'tis constant dropping
Wears away the hardest stone.
Never slack sublime endeavor,
Nor 'midst cheerlessness despair;
If you'd rise above your fellows,
Brother! you must "Win and Wear."
'Tis the lesson Nature teaches
All throughout her wide domain,
And the text from which she preaches
Is "that labor leads to gain."
Moral worth and honest merit—
Better crowns than monarchs bear—
These you never can inherit—
Brother! these you "Win and Wear."

That's Baby.

One little row of ten little toes,
To go along with a brand-new nose,
Eight new fingers and two new thumbs,
That are just as good as sugar-plums—
That's baby.

One little pair of round new eyes,
Like a little owl's, so old and wise—
One little place they call a mouth,
Without one tooth from north to south—
That's baby.

Two little cheeks to kiss all day,
Two little hands, so in his way,
A brand-new head, not very big,
That seems to need a brand-new wig—
That's baby.

Dear little row of ten little toes,
How much we love them nobody knows;
Ten little kisses on mouth and chin,
What a shame he wasn't a twin—
That's baby.

My Visit to India.

Alick went among his acquaintances, and had no difficulty in securing a number of pupils, all that he could receive. He was a good man and an excellent teacher. One day I visited this school, and was greatly interested. His specialty was astronomy, and he was forever talking of the stellar wonders. He knew the names of all the principal stars and constellations, and who named them. He had looked through the greatest telescope in the world, and he had been up in a balloon three times, though he had never gone so high as to reach a star—of course not. His scholars would sit almost breathless while he would relate his wonderful experiences looking through telescopes and sailing in balloons.

The boys undertook to make a balloon, and, if they did fail in the undertaking, they at least learned to handle tools, as well as the practice of patience and perseverance.

Alick called up a class of little boys, and put them through an exercise.

First, they repeated together this:

The world is round and like a ball—
Seems swinging in the air.
The sky extends around it all,
And stars are shining there.

Then questions were asked concerning planets, morning and evening stars, etc., all of which were answered promptly and correctly.

Like the governor, Alick was inclined to be superstitious, and adhered to many ancient customs, particularly the one relating to sneezing; and he taught his scholars to clap their hands and say, "God bless our noble master," whenever they heard him sneeze. This superstition marred the mind of an otherwise learned man, but the superstition was owing to his early training. This shows how important it is that children should be reared without superstitious fancies.

One day Alick took his scholars to see an old castle that once belonged to his grandfather; for his ancestors always had lived in that country. After they had viewed the ruins Alick told them there was one thing more he wanted to show them. Taking a key from his pocket, he unlocked a door that opened into a small room containing but one article—a large chest of fine workmanship. It was inlaid with many different kinds of wood, all in the Moorish design, for the Moors were the original owners of that chest. And the mosaic work consisted of gods, devils, gorgeous temples, and other fantastic and curious designs in arabesque style.

The old chest was a self-locking concern, with many springs and curious fastenings. While they were examining the old chest, Alick espied a sheet of paper lying at the bottom of the chest. He was short in stature, and while stooping to reach the paper, he lost his balance and fell into the chest. The fall made a great dust, and set him sneezing, which jarred the lid so violently that it fell down with a great bang. The boys were unable to lift the cover, for as it fell it fastened of its own accord. But when their master sneezed, they clapped their hands and cried with tears rolling down their cheeks, "God bless our noble master!" They tried and tried to raise the cover of that chest, but all in vain. Running to a window they chanced to see a man with an ax, and beckoned him to come. The stranger, with a well-directed blow, broke the lid, and let the daylight into the cavernous box. But, alas, it was too late! Alick was quite dead. There was great lamentation when the dead body of the teacher was taken to his home, for everyone liked the good teacher and quiet man and friend to everybody. Annie grieved so for her Uncle Alick that it was feared her health would be affected, and she was sent into the country with Tamsee, on a visit to her three lively cousins.

We had no idea how late it was while talking about my visit to India, but the children were wide awake and anxious to hear more.

"No," I said, "it would be dissipation to prolong this talk. We will retire, and continue our stories of India some other time."

Charley, Lottie, and Bertha thanked me for my kindness, and said, "Good night, Auntie—some other night you will tell us more about India, and what you saw there."

MIRIAM.

The Feast of the Dragon.

San Francisco had the pleasure, on the 23d and 24th of September last, to see a really grand procession, got up entirely by our Chinese residents. It was large, expensiv, gorgeous, and barbarous to the last degree, except that no special cruelty had any part therein. It was intended as an occasion of joy and feasting.

The legend of the occasion was that the great god of China, represented by the material form of a monster dragon, and seen on the national standard, is weary of his confinement in the temple, and must hav a view of his people and a temporary place of residence for one night. On Friday he went on his excursion, and on Saturday returned home for duty till next year.

The dragon, with a monstrous head, had the body and tail of a snake. It was at least sixty-five feet long, made up of wood, paper, brass, spangles, and silk of the most gaudy colors, and supported all along by men who were supposed to be out of sight, but took no pains to support that pleasant illusion.

This leading dragon was followed and supported by another, no less monstrous in appearance, but with a much shorter body. This was the offset to the other. While the first was kind, this was all fury and destruction. A stout warrior, well armed, was ever maintained at its head, to restrain it from wholesale mischief. His prowess, however, always proved equal to the occasion, and no reckless spectator was devoured.

Otherwise the procession had many of the features of our own. There were soldiers, princes, nobles, priests, and fairies. Several lesser divinities were carried in state. Banners abounded, and Chinese bands of what they called music.

To the casual San Franciscan it was all very fine, but very foolish, though there were those who were so intensely anti-celestial as to put these words in another shape, and pronounce it all very foolish and not very fine. It was indeed the barbarism of early dawn of invention before the severest critics of a matured civilization. California is solid, practical, and real, and takes little delight in tinseled gewgaws. It is not capable of being horrified by monsters of paint and paper. Herein our Chinese entertainers were greatly chagrined at the utter failure of all their efforts to inspire fear. When the monsters opened their huge jaws, even our women were more intent on discerning some new kind of trimming for a bonnet than paralyzed by that fierce cavern. To the ordinary observer it was just a thing of beauty that, like a summer flower, fades and is gone forever. But to the scholar, the historian, the antiquary, and the naturalist there was more in this procession than what presented itself to the casual observer. It was a peep at the cradle of human society. These unprogressiv children of Asia, in their simplicity, paraded before us many of the germs of our greatest institutions. We hav modified them, strained them a little to our own taste and purpose, but in that procession we saw the original germ and recognized it at once. China is at the head of the stream of human civilization. None of these chattels has floated up-stream to her. Wherever there is a faint likeness she was the teacher. The fable of the wolf and the lamb illustrates this most beautifully. The lamb, drinking below, could not soil the stream above. So the nations who come after China could not hav given her these fantasies. She gave them to those down-stream. She was the teacher. Whatever was in these mummeries that is like unto our own we got from her. We find their origin in this procession.

Let San Francisco trace its pedigree as a city back through the ages, and it will be found to settle back to China or to that neighborhood. It will read thus: New York, London, Paris, Rome, Greece, Persia, India, and China. China was the first to hav a great monarchy that we know anything about. It was the first to hav a church. In the court there the fashion of dress, the attendant halberdiers, the priests, the form of obeisance before the throne, were all well settled long before our modern civilization had its dawn. The emperor was absolute, and the obeisance profound. The same forms found their way westward. They were modified by a more free and sturdy race. In China they break their noses on the floor. In Iudia they do little less. In Persia the form tapers a little. The manly Greek went on both knees. The Roman much the same. In France and England one knee filled the bill. In Washington a respectful bow is all that the sovereign citizen deigns to giv the president. But it is all, the whole court, its dress, appurtenances, and manners, almost a servil copy of the Chinese.

In church matters the likeness is even more striking. The priests in that procession had imitation metallic breastplates and flowing somber robes. In the joss-house lights and incense burn perpetually. The form of worship is the same—to kneel, to bow, to join the hands with the tips of the fingers up. The images, the altars, are almost an exact copy. Our Protestant churches hav stepped well away from the ancient Chinese forms, but still the germs are there.

The tinkling cymbal, the conch-shell, and the ram's-horn by which the walls of Jericho were blown down were in that procession. And the celestial musician blew as though he thought our San Francisco might yield in the same way.

Our old men and women will remember the time when the morning milkman came with his yoke over his shoulder and his two buckets of milk. The original type was in that procession; not copied from ours, but on a Chinese pattern, manifestly original with them.

Those who hav seen the procession of the lord mayor of London, with the figures of Gog and Magog, in a moment recognized this Chinese procession as its original. Gog is the dragon, and Magog the lesser and evil spirit that is fought at every step by an intrepid warrior.

Nay, St. George himself, the patron saint of England, is only this same warrior, mounted on a good English steed, who kills the dragon outright.

An aged Chinaman, after all had gone by, said to us: "Plenty fool Chinaman! China got two kinds of people. One kind fight that dragon of paper and think he all right. He got no sense. The other he fight the dragon of sin and injustice. He plenty understand. The first he follow Con-fut-see. He talk riddle, paradox, metaphor. He plenty foolee all men. He say, 'You no think! You workee and obey.' This good for all poor men; make him easy to rule. The other, he follow I-am-see. He speak fact; no more. He teach men to govern. 'I-am,' that mean what is, what is true, what is fact. China wise man follow I-am. 'See,' is truth. 'I-am-see,' means I am truth. 'Con-fut-see,' means to mix truth with figures and fables. Con-fut-see (you call him Confucius) said the people were foolish and must not be made wise. The emperor like him, and call him great man, and the coolie worship him. But I-am-see is better, greater, and will in the end be greatest."

So there is wisdom in China. There are those who regard these mummeries as sacred things, and there are others who see them as they are. We who hav sipped at all these fountains of progress of Persia, Greece, Rome, England, and our western States smile at the foibles of old China, though still some dregs remain in our own customs.

We are destined to carry the flag of progress across the Pacific and enlist the cradle of civilization in the march.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am twelve years old, and hav a little sister of ten. Our mamma died when we were little girls. My sister, pa, and I kept house in Neligh, Nebraska, last winter, and my sister and I went to school. I was in the fourth room; studied reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, geography, singing, grammar, and drawing. My teacher was Miss Jessie Comstock. My aunt, Mary B. Finch, takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. And I like to read the Children's Corner very much.

I will close now, hoping to see this letter in print, it being my first one.

BOWLING GREEN, O., April 6, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I take the pleasure of writing to the Corner for the first time. We had a nice shower last night, and everything looks very nice to-day, it made the grass look so green. Our school is out now, and we are having a nice time making maple sugar. We hav plenty of natural gas in our town. We furnish the factories with natural gas. We hav five glass factories and one rolling mill. The town has about five thousand inhabitants. I read the Corner every week. I hav lots of fun over Mr. Heston's pictures. I can hardly wait till Saturday night to see the pictures and read the Corner. I took lots of pleasure reading Mr. Peck's letter to the little children, and hope to see another in the Corner from him. We had twelve little chickens hatch out the first of March. We hav two little pet lambs.

I will close, hoping to see my letter in print, this being my first attempt to write.

I remain, Your sincere friend,

MYRTLE ELLIOTT (aged twelve).

MISS S. H. WIXON: In the interest of the Children's Corner please find inclosed a clipping from the Pacific Rural Press, "The Feast of the Dragon," to copy, or from which to write an essay for the Corner. The article is remarkable for the amount of religious history condeused in so small a space, and its acute portrayal of the religious customs and their evolutionary origin.

In this celestial dragon we see the Fenris wolf described by Hesiod, and the Midgard serpent in its giant rage to reach the land, all symbolical of some great event in the world's history, and, with the Christian serpent of paradise, the devil, having one common origin (to wit, Ragnarok).

With a profound appreciation of your kindness to the children through the Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I remain,

Most respectfully, the old wood-chopper,

T. J. CONLEY.

[We are greatly obliged to our friend for the clipping, which we place before the readers of the Corner with pleasure.—ED. C. C.]

FITCHVILLE, O., April 13, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Mr. Peck asked the little boys and girls to write to him, but I don't know where his post-office is. We hav not had THE TRUTH SEEKER long. A kind lady sends it to mamma. I like to read the letters. My brother has been studying physics this winter, and he and I hav experimented some in electricity. I will write some of the experiments so the little folks can try them.

Take a sheet of paper and a board about the same size. Heat both till they are thoroughly dry. While hot lay the paper on the board and rub it with a piece of rubber. The paper and board will cling together. You can electrify the paper by heating it and drawing it under your arm if you hav on a woolen coat, then hold the paper over a person's head if you want to see his hair stand on end. The paper will cling to the wall when thrown against it. There are a great many novel experiments, but I am afraid my letter will be too long if I write any more. I am twelve years old. I wish some of the children would write to me. We liv on a farm. We hav been making maple sugar. I would like to send all of you some in a letter. Brother J. and I went a-fishing last Sunday; we pulled out some big bass, if it was Sunday. We think it is more fun than to go to Sunday-school; but the Badger boy gets some fun out of it, it seems.

BERTIE MARTIN.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

Cain's Wife.

Where did he get her?
Who was her brother?
Had she a sister?
Had she a mother?
Was she pre-Adamic—
Born before history—
With her identity
Shrouded in mystery?
Maid of Phœnicia,
Egypt, Arabia,
Africa, India,
Or sun-kissed Suabia?
Who was her father?
Was he a viking,
Cruising about
Just to his liking;
Out of the Whenceness,
Over the water,
Into the Where,
Bringing his daughter?
Nativ of Norway,
Denmark or Sweden?
Lured by the charms
Of the garden of Eden?
Blonde or brunet?
Rounded or slender?
Fiery or frigid?
Haughty or tender?
Why are her graces
Unknown to fame?
Where did Cain meet her?
What was her name?
Whisper it softly—
Say, can it be
The lady we seek Was R. Haggard's "She?"

Tell me, ye sages,
Students of life,
Answer my query:
Who was Cain's wife?

Enoch.

In looking through the Holy Queer, you are liable to run across the following mysterious and startling piece of information concerning a party who lived and moved and had his being in antediluvial days, prior to the settlement of Boston and the organization of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, dispute it as the Bostonese may:

"And Enoch walked with God, and he was not; for God took him!"

Now, if this is not a paralyzer, what sort of an announcement would be? The first time I read this sentence I was affected as though by an electric shock; the second reading plunged me into a state of coma from which I was relieved only by the opportune arrival of a bottle of "Old Crow," and when I passed to a third reading, Macbeth would not hav remarked, as he did to Banquo's ghost, "There's no speculation in thine eyes," for eyes and head were running over with it, and I hav been "speculating" ever since with regard to that startling and awe-inspiring statement!

"And Enoch walked with God, and he was not; for God took him!" Great Jones! if this isn't a caution to the unwary, I don't know what would be. Most assuredly, for one, I am not going to take any chances of being "took" in this unceremonious manner, and don't you forget it! Great Cæsar! suppose a fellow were on the way to a progressiv poker party, and, happening to "walk with God" a piece, should very suddenly be not, God having "took him!" Why, it is enough to make one shake in his boots, his eyes like billiard balls to bulge from their sockets, his each particular hair to stand like bristles on a wild boar's back, and—and—well, all that sort of thing, you know. This is how I looked at it, understand, before formulating a theory in regard to the matter.

"Enoch walked with God," that is, he was a henchman ever found in the ranks of the Solid Muldoons of Faith, God's body guard on earth, and an organization that never patronized brass Jahvehs and other palpable and portable abominations. "And he was not; for God took him." This is all plain enough now, according to my theory. It was simply this: God found, after walking with Enoch three hundred years—this was the length of time, according to a previous portion of the very succinct history of Enoch—that he was altogether too good for this earth, and so "took him" on the spur of the moment, as it were, and, presumably, to Blissville.

It is to be regretted that this startling piece of information was sawed off so abruptly, leaving us really in the dark as to where he "took him." This was not so in Elijah's case, and why in Enoch's? But there, the inference, really a certainty, is, that he "took him" up to Blissville! Where else would he take him, after that "three hundred years' walk?" He wasn't taking people "out," like one friend does another at the theater, between the acts; and the presumption, amounting to certainty, is, that he "took him" to his own place, probably putting him in a glass case to keep him from the dust, and immaculate!

Oh, this most unsatisfactory account of a most remarkable and hair-curling event! "God took him!" Admitted, but how? We all know of the dramatic brilliancy of the "taking" of Elijah, but how, oh, how was Enoch "took?" Had there been a chariot and horses of fire, mention never would hav been omitted, I feel certain. Such a spectacle is too novel, too brilliant, too dramatic, and too sensational, not to say too amazing, to let go by default of mention. No, Enoch was not "took" to Blissville by this mode of conveyance, I feel confident. The probability is that God collared him on the fly, whistled for cherubims for two, in a batter of cloud, as it were, when he and his prize were whisked away through the circumambient like a pair of chickens on the bosom of a wild cyclone!

Whether or not there were any spectators of this marvelous and awe-compelling occurrence, the Holy Queer does not state. None was needed to vouch for the truth of it, as the "inspired" scribe who mentioned it penned from dictation or an "inspiration" that compelled him to pen cold facts! But if there were spectators—and the governor of Blissville dearly loved to show his hand at the superhuman—how their eyes must hav bulged, their teeth chattered, their knees knocked—oh, I guess yes—and the probability is they went prone to the dust under the burden of a great and exceeding fear, no two of them being able to tell the same story of the affair after they recovered.

But this is immaterial; what exercises me is why, Enoch being, presumably, the one prime pomegranate of purity and perfection, ripely righteous and righteously ripe, and altogether worthy of being "took" by God, an extraordinary and most unusual proceeding, we were not favored with a much more extended account of his holy "walk," which must hav been square heel and toe, with never a skip or a shuffle! A mortal who "walked with God three hundred years" was certainly worthy of something more comprehensiv, fitting, and luminous than the brief, ghostly, obscure, lean, lank, starved statement that he "walked with God, and he was not; for God took him"—a mere morsel of mystery, in fact, a miserly measure of mention such as no fair to middling mortal would be content to make anent a "yaller dog," unless the tawny canine belonged to a neighbor not particularly esteemed.

Why was Enoch honored so muchly more in the breach than in the observance of mention? Why was this indubitably truly good man shunted to the narrow-gage siding of obscurity, and Elijah given a long run on the broad-gage track of prominence? I think I hav it. Enoch was, probably, a peacefully pious partisan of the Lord; a deacon, a passer of the plate, a powerful prayer of prayers, a Sunday-school superintendent, etc., and never patronized the wicked theater, or slipped round through the slums on the sly in search of salad for the sinful soul! That was the kind of pokeberry pious Enoch was, undoubtedly, while Elijah was a pushing, prodding, highly pyrotechnical partisan of the Lord, who made things terrifically torrid for the brass god constituency, greatly to the gratification of the God of A., I., and J., who counseled heroic treatment in the false god disease. That was the kind of sky-rocket Elijah was, and so, being a man right after the Lord's own heart, he not only received much mention in the Holy Queer, but was pyrotechnically "took" to Blissville, and not in a mysterious way borne off!

Right here a conundrum opens up to me: Was Enoch a bigger man than Abraham? I mean on the righteous lay, of course. I should hope he did lay over the latter, for he was a beat and a sharp. Now, all three of these parties were especial pets of the Lord, yet not one of them was "took" to Blissville by his patron; neither did the Lord ever drop a word on which either could build hopes of a future life in elysium, much less promis anything of the kind. The very best he had to offer either, when trailing him to and fro and up and down the earth, was that he should liv to a good old age and sleep with his fathers! Now, if these three solid Muldoons were allowed to "perish as the beasts perish," what sort of sanctified symphony must Enoch hav been on that momentous day—to him—when "God took him?" Why, he must hav been a sort of human "holy ghost," as it were, and nothing shorter! As for A., I., and J.—father, son, and grandson—why, everybody knows they are roaming the elysian fields, and so it must be that God, keeping dark while having to do with them on earth, intended for the favorit trio a surprise party after death! I can't account for his reticence, while dealing with them here, in any other way.

But our friend Enoch: As I hav intimated, he must hav been a holy terror of holiness, with no rebate! And yet what do we know of his record? Nothing or next to nothing! Beyond the bare, bald statement that he "walked with God three hundred years [this was an awful long walk and one that puts Weston to the blush], and he was not, for God took him," we know nothing! Hold—there was one other thing worth mentioning, perhaps: He was the sire of one who lived to the greatest age known—Methuselah—and it was after the birth of this destined-to-be long-lived son that he took the long "walk with God," meanwhile, however, begetting other sons and daughters, of no account, probably, their names not being given. Yes, Enoch was the sire—dam unknown—of that old stager, Methuselah, who knocked out of time 969 years before sleeping with his fathers, according to the record!

Well, perhaps it would be superfluous to say anything more of a man than that he was the sire of one who got away with nearly a thousand years before passing in his checks—perhaps, I don't know. Anyhow, that is all the record Enoch gets, beyond the barebacked statement that he "walked with God three hundred years, and he was not; for God took him!" Selah!

SI SLOKUM.

Religious Personalities.

Mrs. Mary E. Rawson, of Emporia, Kan., is in the insane asylum, a victim of religious excitement.

Adam Saurs and Mrs. Wm. Stahl, of Fostoria, O., who became insane recently over religious excitement, are both dead.

The Rev. Dr. Winfield, editor of the Arkansas Methodist, has had to pay $1,500 and costs of a suit for indulging his slanderous propensities in a libel on Dr. Robinson, of Morrillton, Ark.

Rev. Moffett Neill, Presbyterian of Hayesville, O., languishes in jail because he ran away with the wife of the man with whom he boarded, after making love to and committing adultery with her.

The elevating influence of Christianity failed to keep A. B. Downs, the leading church-member and Sunday-school superintendent at Irvinton, Ill., from burglarizing W. P. Cooper's dry goods store.

Miss Ellen Thompson, of Salem, Ill., has given birth to child. The Rev. Charles L. Dillman, of Odin Christian church, a successful revivalist and skilful church-business man, is alleged to be responsible.

At Hamburg, Germany, Pastor Wannak, the head of a refuge for fallen women, has been arrested for converting the refuge into a harem and filling it with debauchery. Other directors of the refuge are implicated.

Charles Tierson, Hamburg, Ia., recently shot dead two men who were stealing his hogs. Strange to state, deceased are found to be prominent evangelists who hav been conducting a series of revival meetings.

Continual contact with the obscene literature from which he had to preach Sundays has ruined the morals of Rev. William Lord, West Creek, N. J., and he is accused of assaulting a young lady in the parsonage.

Rev. R. Wallace, Chillicothe, O., seems to hav been reading his Old Testament too closely. Starting hotly off in Solomon's track and engaging himself to three fair sisters at once, he has had to be suspended from the ministry.

Rev. J. W. Ashman, of Emanuel Protestant Episcopal church, of Detroit, Mich., admits that he "absorbed unconsciously the language and ideas" of another preacher, and put them forth as his own. He is on trial before his vestry.

William H. Sumner is the name of a zealot who insisted on practicing Bible morals in Housatonic, Mass. Though a prominent churchman and leader of the choir, he had to leave town after being caught in a compromising situation with Mrs. Maria L. Brown.

When we get Christianity made "the supreme law of the land" Deacon M. R. Mitchell, of Topeka, Kan., may justify himself from the Bible in seducing a widow of his church. At present secular parties of that neighborhood are making it uncomfortable for him.

Many are they that trouble the Rev. P. H. Melville, of Dublin: they increase that rise up against him: they prepare against him the instruments of death. This means that he has been beaten twice for insulting ladies, and shot at for seducing the daughter of Capt. John J. Dunne.

Mr. F. H. Parker, the most fervent exhorter in the Castellar Methodist church of Omaha, has been missing for some months, together with some $900 of church funds. Mrs. Maclede mourns his loss as a bogus husband, and also because he took all her jewelry with him.

J. P. Phillips has long been superintendent of the South-side Baptist Sunday-school at Milwaukee, and enjoyed high consideration among the church folks. The consideration has not been enjoyed so much since he made a dishonest failure, raised all possible money and left for Canada.

Rev. Wm. Thomas Abbott West, of Chesterton, Ind., abandoned his family to run away with a girl he had seduced, begged piteously to get back and was forgiven and received by his wife, and again ran away with the girl and poisoned her. Men are scouring the woods for him.

The ecclesiastical trial of Rev. Howard T. Widdemer, of the Protestant Episcopal church of Philadelphia, began in earnest on the 18th ult. The charges against Mr. Widdemer accuse him of immorality and violation of the canon of the church entitled, "Of Marriage and Divorce."

The Rev. Moses H. Harris, of the Zion Methodist church at New Rochelle, has been found guilty of stealing a report from the church, and lying about it under oath, thereby committing perjury. He was fined $15, but could hav been sentenced to a year in the penitentiary and fined $250.

The good folks of Kentland, Ind., say that there can be but two excuses for the beastly conduct, "crimes too foul for print," for which Rev. James Siddall is being tried, and "one excuse is total depravity, the other insanity." Why be surprised at the practical realization of the total depravity doctrin that they teach?

The absurd-looking object seen wandering away from Ligon, a city not far from New Orleans, one morning recently, was the pastor of a colored Baptist church whose enemies had prevailed against him and enveloped him in tar and feathers. They say that nothing else would restrain his affection for their wives and daughters.

"Not until a virgin shall offer herself as a sacrifice upon the altar may ye enter the kingdom of heaven," cried a pretty young woman as she was assisted to alight from the patrol wagon at a Milwaukee jail a few days ago. She was of German descent, by the name of Schroeder, and crazed by religion. She is in the lunatic asylum.

Pastor Staunton, of the Fort Greene Presbyterian church, Brooklyn, N. Y., was deposed from the ministry on the 17th ult. Undue intimacy with a parishioner was the charge that led to his trouble, and though a trial ended in a verdict of not guilty, his brethren who hav not been found out thought he should quit the preaching business.

The Congregationalist minister at Economy, N. S., has been obliged suddenly to deprive that place of his presence. A shy confession was made by a married woman whose husband has been absent in the States a year or two that the twins recently added to the family circle owe their parentage to the spiritual director. Two or three other homes now make similar reports.

The Rev. B. Longley, Bachelor of Arts and pastor of the Queen street Methodist church of Toronto, Ont., being accused of serious indiscretions with some women who were members of his church, and being asked for an explanation by the president of conference, not only resigned the office of pastor of the Queen street church, but also severed his connection with the ministry.

Mrs. McDonald, of Lakeside, O., declares that nothing but a sense of duty could induce her to make charges against the minister who consoled her on the death of her husband, but that he really did bring a woman to her house for immoral purposes. This reverend, Dr. Thompson Hildreth, of the Lorain street, Cleveland, M. E. church, also has charges of a long course of immorality to answer.

The case of the Rev. Robert T. Pearson, pastor at Setauket, N. Y., and Mrs. Elbeson is described by newspapers as one "of a libidinous old hypocrit and a silly, weak-minded woman, obedient to every wish of her spiritual adviser." Mrs. Elbeson eloped with her paramour, was divorced by her husband, and the couple now liv in New Jersey, where Pearson, still unexpelled, holds forth as a Protestant Episcopal clergyman.

Rev. William Hammond, eminent for the high standard of morality and divinity to which he has exhorted his various communities the last twenty years, is under arrest at Fulton county, Ill. A record now being made of sundry little diversions with which he has enlivened his travels embraces so far lying, arson, theft, fraud, burglary, bigamy, half a dozen seductions, and wife-poisoning twice.

The Chicago Times observes: "One thing must be said for Tennessee: They stick to their religion there. Now, only last Sunday a man going to church in Knoxville left his wife at the church door while he stepped across the street to shoot two or three men. He did shoot two of them, and would hav shot the third had the third not run away. The man himself got one bullet through his arm and another ripped up his scalp, but he managed all right to get into meeting in time for the prayer, if not for the collection. They never let anything interfere with their religion down in Tennessee."

Recent murders and poisoning of persons in the interior of Mexico engaged in school-teaching, editing liberal newspapers, etc., are charged by the Monitor Republicano on fanatical rural priests. One of the victims was a young Mexican lady, a Protestant, who went to teach in a small village in the state of Tobasco. She was poisoned shortly after opening her school, and though her life was saved her reason is thought to hav been destroyed. Another case was the murder of three Protestants in the state of Guerrero by a mob; and a third case is the recent murder of the editor of a Liberal newspaper in the state of Vera Cruz, who had attacked the church roughly and had been denounced from the pulpit by his priestly enemies.

At Vigo, Spain, Doña Manuela Pas Luz, a young lady of fortune, recently entered a convent, against the wishes of her father, who objected on the ground that she was still a minor, and because she was in very bad health. The severities of the novitiate and religious excitement made her much worse. Two medical men sent by the prefect at the request of the father reported that she was seriously ill, and recommended that she should at once leave the convent. The superior refused to consent, and declined to admit other doctors sent by the prefect. The father then applied for assistance to the bishop of Tuy, but he would not interfere. An order was obtained against the superior directing her to giv up the girl to her father. At 6 o'clock on the morning, however, of the day when she was to be taken home, the sick novice took perpetual vows. The formalities of the canon law having been complied with, the civil authorities could no longer interfere, and the father, who went to the convent, had to leave after a painful scene at the convent gate. On the day when Doña Manuela took the vows as Sister Manuela she became seriously ill and had to be attended by the doctors. Eight days afterward she died, leaving her fortune to the convent. The matter will be brought up in the Chamber by the Republican deputies.

ARGUMENT
BY
Robert G. Ingersoll,
IN THE
TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS
FOR
"BLASPHEMY,"
AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.
Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.
Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.
In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.
The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.
Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

THE LORD'S TRAINED HORNETS.

And I will send hornets before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite, from before thee.—Ex. xxiii, 28.

Odds and Ends.

A SPRING garment: The wire bustle.

ARTIST: "What is the finest picture of still life you hav ever seen?" Chicago girl: "St. Louis."

IT may be that a man can love but one woman in a lifetime, but how is he going to know unless he tries?

A BASS drum may be a snare and a noisy instrument, but it is not as loud as a girl's hair when it is banged.

A BUFFALO member of the legislature was recently hanged in effigy, and a disgusted political opponent says: "History may well ask: Why in effigy?"

THERE is a Connecticut parson so fond of money that, it is said, after paying a man's bill he walks home with him, so as to be near the money as long as possible.

SAID a Scotchwoman to a physician who was pouring out ten drops of medicin for a child: "Dinna be so mean wi' it, it's for a puir fatherless bairn."

FIRST lady: "Has your husband quit smoking yet?" Second lady (just returned from the far West): "Well, he ought to by this time; he's been dead six months."

WHEN Eve upon the first of men
The apple pressed with specious cant,
Oh, what a thousand pities then
That Adam was not Adamant!

PHYSICIANS are disputing whether it is possible for a man to commit suicide by holding his breath. There are some who think that perhaps a man could do it, but they are all unanimously agreed that a woman couldn't.

A MAN can master the free lunch route,
And a man can carry the banner,
But he can't sew the rip in his Sunday coat,
Because he isn't built in that manner.

NEAR-SIGHTED hens are not so bad after all. Jones says he had one once that ate a quart of sawdust, supposing that it was meal, and then went off and laid a nestful of bureau knobs. But Jones is near-sighted himself.

"DID you ever go tobogganing, Mr. Winterwheat?" "No," said the old man, "but I once stepped into the elevator well and fell down four stories in three-tenths of a second. That is fast enough for me; I'm getting too old for much excitement."

DUDELY VANDERCLAM: "Mith Bondclipper, I weally believe it ith the mission of woman to make fools of uth men." Miss Bondclipper: "Yes, and you hav no idea, Mr. Vanderclam, how vexed we are to find that nature has so often forestalled us."

FIRST Kansas woman: "Were you at the polls yesterday, Minnie?" Second Kansas woman: "Oh, yes, I was out at the dear little polls. Isn't it just too nice to vote?" "How did you vote?" "Really, dear, I don't remember." "Well, you remember that they had two kinds of tickets—white and red?" "Oh, I remember now. It was the lovely little red ticket that I put on the polls." "Why, I am surprised; that was the opposition ticket." "Well, I didn't ask. I saw that the color of the ticket was a delicate red and that it exactly matched my dress."

OMAHA man: "I see by the papers that a Chicago policeman has gone crazy because the girl he wanted wouldn't hav him." Police captain: "Guess there must be some mistake about that." "Didn't you ever hear of a policeman going crazy?" "I never heard of a girl refusing a policeman."

A PASSENGER on a Missouri train was shot at by a desperado, and was saved by a plug of tobacco which stopped the bullet. This may be offered as an argument in favor of the vile weed, but it should be remembered that a copy of the New Testament in the same pocket would hav had a similar salutary effect.

"THE British are ahead of us in one respect," said the general, after a warm argument with an Anglophobiac on the respectiv merits of England and America. "In what, I should like to know?" demanded the Anglophobiac, incredulously. "Time," replied the general; "it is 7 o'clock in London when it is only 2 here."

RECENT convert: "If a man does me an injury I suppose I ought to reward him, oughtn't I?" Good pastor: "It would show the right spirit." "Making him a little present would do, wouldn't it?" "That would certainly heap coals of fire on his head." "Suppose instead of a man it's an animal?" "It should make no difference." "Well, your dog has been snapping at me every time I pass, and this morning I made him a present of something we've valued for many years. It's a tin kettle. You'll find him somewhere in the next county."

'TWOULD surely tax the mind to dream
A lovelier scene—a picture rarer.
They sat together, eyes abeam—
No gayer youth—no maiden fairer.

He'd told his love. The verdict pleased him;
She thought of veil and wedding kiss,
He smiled to think how long she'd teased him,
Both talked of joy and wedded bliss.

O ardent youth! Would that you knew
The price per pound for ribs of beef.
O maiden fair! Will you not rue
When your first baking comes to grief?

But so goes love, and so goes life.
Fond hearts ofttimes lese sight of purse;
Sweetheart who changes into wife
Oft flies from rhyme to dry, blank verse.

Gems of Thought.

MRS. GENERAL was not to be told of anything shocking. Accidents, miseries, and offenses were never to be mentioned before her. Passion was to go to sleep in the presence of Mrs. General and blood was to change to milk and water. The little that was left in the world, when all these deductions were made, it was Mrs. General's province to varnish. In that formation process of hers, she dipped the smallest of brushes into the largest of pots, and varnished the surface of every object that came under consideration. The more cracked it was, the more Mrs. General varnished it.—Dickens's Little Dorrit.

(1) IF any opinion is compelled to silence, that opinion may, for aught we can certainly know, be true. To deny this, is to assume our own infallibility. (2) Though the silenced opinion be an error, it may, and very commonly does, contain a portion of truth; and since the general or prevailing opinion on any subject is rarely or never the whole truth, it is only by the collision of adverse opinions that the remainder of the truth has any chance of being supplied. (3) Even if the received opinion be not only true, but the whole truth, unless it be suffered to be, and actually is, vigorously and earnestly contested, it will, by most of those who receive it, be held in the manner of a prejudice, with little comprehension or feeling of its rational grounds. And not only this, but (4) the meaning of the doctrin itself will be in danger of being lost or enfeebled and deprived of its vital effect on the character and conduct; the dogma being a mere formal profession, inefficacious for good, but cumbering the ground and preventing the growth of any real and heartfelt conviction, from reason or personal experience.—J. S. Mill's Liberty.

MOST men do not reason at all, and accept their religion as they accept their science—at second-hand.—Leslie Stephen.

IT is said in the New Testament, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." And suppose that, after all, death does end all, next to being forever with those we love and those who hav loved us, next to that is to be wrapt in the dreamless drapery of eternal peace.—Ingersoll.

IF I must take my choice between the pair
That rule alternately the weary hours,
Night is than day more acceptable;—sleep
Doth, in my estimate of good, appear
A better state than waking; death than sleep;
Feelingly sweet is stillness after storm,
Though under covert of the wormy ground.
—Wordsworth.

THEMISTOCLES, who is undoubtedly to be received as an authority, when he was consulted whether a man should marry his daughter to a worthy poor man, or to a rich man of less approved character, said, "I certainly would rather she married a man without money, than money without a man."—Cicero.

HE who runs a race ought to make exertions and struggle as much as he can to be victor; but he ought by no means to trip up or push with his hand the person with whom he is contending. Thus in life it is not unjust that every man may and should seek for himself what may pertain to his own advantage—it is not just that he should take from another.—Chrysippus (b. 280 B.C).

IT is better to receive an injury than to do one.—Cicero.

BLEST are they
Whose sorrow rather is to suffer wrong
Than to do wrong, although themselvs hav erred.
—Wordsworth.

WE see some of the philosophers, which were least divine and most immersed in the senses, and denied generally the immortality of the soul, yet came to this point, that whatsoever motions the spirit of man could act and perform, without the organs of the body, they thought might remain after death, which were only those of the understanding and not of the affections; so immortal and incorruptible a thing did knowledge seem unto them to be.—Bacon's Advancement of Learning.

THE people are surely perplexed about this "revision" of the word of God and, like Kaspar on the field of Blenheim, cannot make out what it is all about. Meanwhile the sceptic chuckles, and haha's, and derides the perplexed believer because there is no hell, and because the expounders of the scripture strive one with another over verbal distinctions and literal renderings. It cannot be denied that the general effect is damaging. Skepticism is rampant all over the civilized world, and thousands of intelligent men and women are losing their grip upon the things spiritual which they once thought they held fast. The expenditure of thousands of dollars in new renderings of Greek and Hebrew will not stay the tide.—Toronto Evening News.

GREEK words and Latin are fine things, but they cannot hide the emptiness and lowness of many who employ them.—Carlyle.

THE SHEPHERDS AND THE SHEEP.

Notes and Clippings.

A COLORED preacher announces to his flock that "there will be no respectable people in heaven." The reason he givs is that God is no respecter of persons.

THE Banner of Light grows irreverent. It says: "Chaplains in the army are called 'Holy Joes,' and in the navy 'sky-pilots.' They are subject to retirement in the army at the age of sixty-four years, and at sixty-two in the navy. There are now sixteen 'Holy Joes' on the army retired list, and seven 'sky-pilots' on the retired list of the navy."

THE temperance folks in Florida hav got the liquor license question fairly solved, in a manner that will almost command the respect of a Prohibitionist. A man who wants to go into the business must first get three hundred signatures to his application, and this list must be published in the county newspaper. He then goes before the court, where strict inquiry is made as to his character. If his application is approved, he pays a license fee of $450, which is equally divided by the state, the county, and the town.

THE Standard sneers: "The little king of Spain has a birthday this month, which will be celebrated by a fête to the Madrid schoolchildren, who will be regaled with meat pies, cakes, oranges, and candy, and hav little medals with the baby king's portrait on them. The grown-up children will be amused with fireworks, bits of ribbon, and parchments entitling them to nicknames of various kinds. Everybody will shout God save the king in Spanish, and a special force of police detectivs will be on the look-out for any symptoms of discontent, and arrest anybody who may be unpatriotic enough to insinuate that things are not as nearly perfect as they can be this side of heaven."

IT has sometimes fallen to the lot of this journal, says Life, to make game of Anglomania, and ridicule such of our brethren as seem to us too eagerly imitativ of British manners and customs. The British nobility has had, and has still, its cult among us, but when one hat goes off to the queen, a thousand heads are bare and throats distended in distinguished consideration of the pope of Rome and the Irish vote in America. Anglomania in this country is an amusing freak, but it seems at times as if Celtomania was becoming an infernal bondage.

A PETITION to Governor Oglesby for the pardon of Anarchists Fielden, Schwab, and Neebe is circulating among the Socialists and Anarchists of Chicago. It is said to hav received thousands of signatures. It is intended to submit it soon to a mass-meeting of workingmen for ratification. The text of this petition is almost word for word the same which was circulated a few days before the hanging of Spies, Fischer, Parsons, and Engel. Nobody has been approached with the document who was not believed to be thoroughly in accord with radical principles.

TOM KAIGLER, a colored preacher, living on Sheriff Gilmour's plantation near Atlanta, Ga., has created considerable excitement among the negroes on account of a revelation he claims to hav had. He says that the Lord has revealed to him that on a certain day he will carry all the negroes to Egypt, and that he (Tom) is to be the leader. The day and hour of departure are set. What causes the prophecy to be believed is that the older colored folks say that before the war the same prophet prophesied that the negroes were to be set free, and that the prophecy was literally fulfilled; hence they believe him now, and are getting their clothing and other things in readiness for the departure.

TRUTH SEEKER readers know the lady of whom the Sun tells this story: "Mrs. Jennie B. Browne, of New Haven, is a woman of nerve, with no nonsense about her. She was crossing a street the other day, when two runaway horses dashed around a corner, and were upon her before she could possibly get out of their way. She faced them squarely, threw up her arms quickly, and sternly shouted, 'Whoa!' The nearest horse tried to obey, reared on his haunches, and then swerved to one side, carrying his mate with him, and then they dashed by so close that portions of the harness tore the bangles from her hat and the lace from the shoulder of her wrap. Mrs. Browne walked to the sidewalk, and with hardly a change of face said to a friend who had looked on: 'It was a narrow escape. Good afternoon!'"

THE Galveston News reports that a large number of Spiritualists assembled in Paris lately to commemorate the anniversary of the death of Allan Kardec, the founder of Spiritual philosophy. Several speeches were delivered alternately by ladies and gentlemen, who developed the precepts of Spiritualism and pointed out the great part it was intended to take in the social transformation of the world. M. Birrmann, the president, made a few remarks on the present state of Spiritualism. Taking as a basis the number of subscribers to the Spiritualistic journals, he estimated that in France there were fifty thousand followers of Allan Kardec, and about two millions altogether in the world. There are in all about one hundred Spiritualist journals. The greater number are in the Spanish language, one is in Hindostani, fourteen in French, of which one is printed in Geneva, four in Belgium, and one at Buenos Ayres. In Paris there are four, three of them organs of the three large Spiritualistic societies in that city.

THE report that a remarkable find of ancient dwellings has been made by railroad builders in Chihuahua reminds the Sun that we are continually indebted to purely business enterprises for discoveries of scientific interest. The recent survey of the ocean bottom along the west coast of Africa, conducted by experts of the Challenger commission, was wholly carried out by a cable company. Its results are of the greatest interest, too, showing as they do, among other things, that the ocean floor from the Niger to the Congo, for a long distance out to sea, has been covered deep by the dark mud and sediment brought down by the great rivers. The shore mud off the Congo's mouth was traced to a depth of eighteen thousand feet six hundred miles west of it. It was the investigations preparatory to laying the first Atlantic cable that gave the first impetus to the study of ocean depths, which has now become a distinct branch of scientific research. Thus business enterprises stimulate science, which in its turn is all the while opening new fields for energy and capital.

Correlativs.

One of the most faulty of all methods professedly founded upon reason, is that one upon which the entire theological and metaphysical world rests. The unanswerable argument used in these schools is in instituting a comparison between objects when the objects are not known, or rather when one is known and the other is not known; and this, too, confessedly not only when one is unknown but when it is unknowable. Seemingly this is without a parallel in the viciousness of method. With what satisfied assurance, if not impudence, we are informed that the "finite has its correlativ in the infinit!" This measureless statement of folly is founded upon the most absurd assumption. In comparison, a relationship must exist between the objects compared; and this is rigorously excluded unless the objects are known. Ignorance of either vitiates the comparison. A and B must be known before agreement or disagreement is possible. Affirmation or negation is possible only when both A and B are known. A knowledge of one, and not of the other, excludes comparison. A finite object or quantity being known, we are enabled to institute a comparison between it and any other object known, and thereby affirm agreement or disagreement. If, however, only one term of the comparison is known, we cannot institute a comparison. As Mr. Spencer very justly says, "A relation cannot be established between something and nothing."

The finite essentially comes within our province. But it denies to us any province outside of itself. And hence to affirm that this, or that, is the correlativ of the finite, it must be stated in the terms of limitation. The finite only being known, fails to giv us any aid to see, feel, or think beyond its own limits. It necessarily denies to us all comparison and all knowledge that does not come to us on the plane of forced limitation.

To say "infinit" is to speak in an unknown tongue, as no idea is conveyed to us only as it comes to us through a metamorphosis which translates it out of its meaningless self into one of limitation; which, being done, stands in evidence of the supreme folly of such a method. The essential terms of our thinking are ever finite, and they being thus, we are excluded from all that does not come to us in the terms of limitation. And therefore to affirm that the finite is the correlativ of the infinit, we having no means of knowing what that term means, is a monstrous absurdity.

This statement is very evident when this word "infinit" is put in the terms of definition; we see at once that the rendering of its definition is done in the terms of limitation. This term, when defined as best it may be, only negativs its use. So in the last analysis this word "infinit" is shown by all attempts to define it to admit of no postulation which the finite is not entitled to.

Hence may we not ask by what law these words are correlativs?

The finite is known through sensation and perception, and the infinit, considered in the light of its definition, is cognized in the same way. If it does not come in this way, how does it come? If it has any meaning to us, it must come through the door of limitation—sensorial reports through groups of nerves to the ganglionic brain center, and thence translated into consciousness, which constitute the source of our information.

There are those who are willing to concede that the finite is given in this manner, but do not thus as to the infinit. But if the infinit—whatever that may mean—comes at all, if it is tenable in any way, it must come through apperception; and in fact, this is really the true theory of these advocates.

But this theory cannot be considered as otherwise than purely imaginary, and, seemingly, called in by one to meet an emergency when pressed to part with all that does not come to us on the line of our human limitation.

Secondly, "infinit space is the correlativ of finite space." This statement is to pass current upon the assumption that it is a statement of fact. Yet nothing can be farther from the truth. We are well informed as to the distances intervening between two objects. There are a certain number of miles between the window behind which I am sitting and the sun whose rays are now falling upon me. I can postulate intelligently limited space, though incompetent to conceive bounds beyond which space is not. This does not, however, confer upon us the ability to postulate of space that it is infinit; for this only forces upon us a palpable contradiction, for I affirm and deny in the same breath. I hav knowledge of space only as limited. I know of space only as I know in the terms of limitation, and hence to speak of it in terms which convey to rational thought no meaning at all. Our conceptions of space are necessarily limited; so long as we who think are assigned limits, so must all of the objects of thought, and of relation, come within the limits which limit us—that is, if they mean anything to us.

We must affirm that that limited space of which we are cognizant is a part of space, and that an addition of limited spaces of equal dimensions is larger than any one of these equal parts. Thus space such as we can cognize is divisible, and hence parts of a whole.

To think meaningly, we are compelled to think of space in these terms.

But infinit space—whatever that is—is not approachable through added increments. It is without body or parts (like the Christian's God); out of relation, and hence is nothing to rational thought. We can utilize space on the basis of limitation, in this, that it is the condition of body, seeing that we know, and can only know, limited body; and hence our conceptions of space are perfectly adequate.

To predicate a relation such as "correlativ" implies is to know the objects related. But we know only limited space, and hence it cannot hav its correlativ in illimitable space—whatever that is—for of such we hav no knowledge at all, because we are locked up within the limited.

Third. "Eternity is the correlativ of time." Here we hav another statement which is open to the same fatal criticism. Our method in the measurement of time is known to all. So many equal portions make one minute, so many one hour, and so many one day, and thus on. Add or multiply as we may, we are ever within the sphere of our limitations; we are only dealing with parts of time. These experts who deal in infinities inform us that time is a part of eternity; that is to say, that all past time is the eternity that is past, and that all time to come is the eternity that is to come. I confess frankly that I fail to extract any meaning at all from these statements.

I find that, in an order of sequence, I hav arrived at consciousness. I note the environment in which I am, and as I attain a knowledge of the same, I find that my inferences as to the past and the future are compelled to rest upon what the present environment suggests. I know myself through succession, constant changes—and hence necessary limitation. This is the language of civilization, expressed in terms which hav a meaning. But "eternity," like the other meaningless terms, fails to convey to consciousness any rational thought. It is impeached when subjected to rational criticism. It is infinit duration expressed in the terms of limitation—and thereby contradicting the postulation, for in expressing it in the terms of addition it becomes a whole; and like the infinit, and infinit space, it is quantitativ. This eternity is made up of parts, showing that the term is void of rational meaning to us. We know only limited time; hence infinit duration conveys no idea to our consciousness. Though we cannot think an end to duration, no more can we think it endless. We think rationally only when we think within our limits. That which transcends our limits is not possible to us.

There is still another fatal objection to this vicious method of reasoning. It is to be seen in the utter impossibility of securing any line of experimentation by which a relationship is found that will disclose these presumable entities named the infinit, absolute, and the unknowable. No additions or mathematical computations can connect these meaningless presumable somethings with the realities of the finite. This in itself is fatal. For if a relationship is found to exist between objects of thought, then they are brought within our limits, and are approachable upon the ground of having quantitativ and qualitativ value, and thus, we see, hav their expression in the terms of limitation, and hence, being thus stated, are necessarily limited. Thus far our definitions go, and under no circumstances can they go farther.

To place these unknowable presumable somethings under the fire of definition is an impeachment of human intelligence, for if defined, as we hav shown, they are limited, for all definitions are necessarily limited, and hence the object of thought defined by force of such definition is also limited. Refuge is sometimes taken in the plea that we know in part. This is one of the methods in common use, and is well calculated to deceive. One moment's reflection will show that this is a false refuge, and in no way lessens the difficulty. If we knew in part, then our knowledge would be increased as our knowledge of parts increased, until our knowledge would be complete in a knowledge of all the parts, and thus limited, made up of added parts, and therefore coming within the formula of limitation. All the advancement we hav made, or will make, must come within the range of our possibilities. We cannot go higher than our highest thought, and that, being limited, informs us of the nature of the objects of thoughts which we think. The thinker being limited, the object thought must also be limited. If we could only bring ourselvs to see this fact as it is, much time now wasted might be rendered useful. Other-worldliness does not serve a purpose which tends to make this life a benefaction. All of the display ever made, or likely to be made, about infinits, absolutes, and the unknowable will hav no tendency to enable the human mind to see things more clearly, or understand the relations of life, and the duties which these relations suggest.

J. H. BURNHAM.

Saginaw City, Mich., April 22, 1888.

Falsehood and Fallacy.

Strange that such remarks as those of the Hon. Mr. Kelly, of Pennsylvania, on the tariff are allowed to go to the public without any attempt to expose the utter falseness of the facts and figures given by him. He begins by uttering the prophecy made by his school in 1843–4: "Destroy the protectiv features of the tariff and national ruin will result." But the free trade tariff of 1846 went into effect. Yet never in all history did our nation make such a splendid progress in manufactures, agriculture, and invention as she did in the following fifteen years. In one decade the wealth of the nation increased 126 per cent, from 1850 to 1860. The number of her manufactories increased by some eighteen thousand (the increase from 1870 to 1880 was but about seventeen hundred), and their product doubled. Protection, when driven to the wall by these figures, murmurs, "Mexican war, new territory acquired, gold in California." But the facts must be admitted. We may ask, if those facts as to new territory and California gold had such effects under free trade, why did not the greater facts of the opening of all the South to free labor and of all the vast, rich prairie region west of the Mississippi river by railways produce equal good effects from 1870 to 1880? It can be shown that our increase of wealth from 1870 to 1880 was in reality no increase pro rata—was not commensurate with our natural increase of population and expansion over new prairie soils. Its total was no greater than it was between 1860 and 1870, during the terrible waste of those four years of war and the years succeeding up to 1870.

Now, to-day, we are confronted by a similar prediction. Here is the language of Judge Kelly, as telegraphed to the world:

> Under this baneful law the census of 1890 will announce the overthrow of our manufacturing supremacy, and our commercial reduction to colonial dependence.
> Wool on the free list will abolish sheep husbandry, destroy the capital embarked, and impoverish one million men who own flocks or are caring for them, diminish the supply of a cheap and healthful food now furnished.
> The law will close a majority of our bituminous coal mines now giving profitable employment to hundreds of thousands of hands North and South.

He then concludes, as reported, with a prophecy of the destruction of the Louisiana sugar-cane industry. He eulogizes this as one of the grandest results of protection. He magnifies and grows magniloquent on this subject, and ends by saying:

> The progress of sugar-making in Louisiana since 1867 might be cited as an illustration of the vitalizing influence of protectiv duties.

So be it, then. When we come to it we are willing to let the whole case stand on that alone. But let us regard these expressions of an "aged statesman," "the father of the House"—statements deliberately written down, studied over, read before the House, and telegraphed to the world, and swallowed, as usual, by the world without inquiry—let us consider them in their order.

First, then, this baneful law will destroy our manufacturing supremacy, and reduce our commercial greatness to colonial dependence.

The commerce of a country is, of course, indicated by its exports and imports, and its supremacy is evinced by the kind of exports it sends out. If a country sends out no manufactures, no agricultural products, or very few, there would be no sense in boasting of its supremacy as a trader at all. Speaking of the commerce of a nation, we must ever hav regard to its population. A country with five million people cannot expect to hav the trade of a country of sixty millions. Consider some few states. Little Belgium, with five million people, leads nearly all the nations that ever hav been on earth. Her exports and imports are about $600,000,000, her imports being some $50,000,000 in excess. Holland, with a smaller population and exports and imports nearly in the same proportion: Imports, $400,000,000; exports, $320,000,000. Then comes Great Britain, with her thirty six millions of people; her annual exports about $1,500,000,000; her imports, $2,000,000,000. Then we hav New Zealand, with a population of half a million, and a commerce of £15,000,000 sterling, or $75,000,000—imports in excess, $10,000,000. Also, New South Wales; population nearly one million. Her trade with the world is nearly $200 000,000; imports in excess some $20,000,000. (England's imports hav exceeded her exports yearly since 1848, sometimes as much as $800,000,000.)

How about the supremacy and mighty independence of the United States? With our sixty millions of people, our commerce has not exceeded about $1,500,000,000, exports and imports included, with an average excess of exports of from $50.000,000 to $100,000,000. Our exports hav been almost exclusivly of agriculture.

Where, then, is the supremacy? Perhaps he meant supremacy of a few people in a limited region on the Atlantic coast over all the vast South and West. If so, he is right; otherwise, this paltry talk of our great wealth, "our supremacy," is sound and fury.

"Wool on the free list will abolish sheep husbandry, make mutton scarce, destroy the business of over a million men." Why should free wool hav such an effect here? Other lands hav free wool and prosperous sheep husbandry. Free wool means cheap wool. That is what he fears. Not long ago free quinine was to destroy American industry and make quinine dear. Free quinine came at 40 cents per ounce, instead of $5. Still, the poor man uses it, and Kelly's constituents—two firms only in the United States then manufacturing—are at it to-day and making money. Cheap sheep makes cheap mutton, Mr. Kelly, and the poor man will continue to eat it. Perhaps you mean that the rich man will refuse to sell cheap mutton. Then we must look to the poor man to supply us. How fiery men like Delano grow on free wool—as great fire-eaters as their predecessors down South on free wooled men! It is something to President Delano, of the "National Wool Growers," to get five cents per pound more on the wool of his millions of sheep, but why it should so excite the ninety-nine vice-presidents—bullet-headed, bucolical men, who each own, perhaps, half a hundred ragged ewes—is hard to understand. Semi-annually the Hon. Delano assembles them, speechifies them, resolves them, and sends forth the angry protests, signed by himself as president, and the ninety-nine aforesaid bullet-headed, bucolical men. Fifty cents more per sheep is millions to the president; it may be $50 direct to the ninety-nine vice-presidents when they haul their wool to town to sell, but indirectly, with the wool over their eyes, when they go to purchase back the cloth and fifty other things, it is several times $50 the other way. For the woolen, the cotton, the cigar, or other manufacturer is by no means content to hav foreign woolens, cottons, or cigars restricted from coming in here. No; for if quinines, tin plates, and a thousand little articles are imported largely, the trade carries away the raw cotton, raw wool, tobacco, etc. Poor protection to him, if foreigners come here "to deluge our nation with cheap goods," and carry off our cotton, wool, tobacco, etc., "raising the market on us." "Whisper! Between us, my friend, we don't care a d—n about protection direct—about protection against the articles we make—but we want to keep the infernal beggars of foreigners away from our raw material. Keep this to yourself."

Yes, protection aims at the trade; if it cannot prevent the export of raw material it is no good.

As to the million men being impoverished, that is too absurd. The census of 1880 gave the whole number of sheep as forty million. All but some fifteen million are owned in small lots. The million men owning some twenty-five sheep each will not be impoverished, judge. It's the dozen or so companies or individuals owning a million each—these are the objects of protection's tenderest solicitude.

"Hundreds of thousands of men are to be ruined by closing a majority of the bituminous coal mines."

Ninety-six million tons is the total output of all the mines. Half of this is anthracite. The census givs the number of souls engaged in mining of all kinds, for all metals, boring for oil, quarrying rock, blasting, etc., as two hundred and thirty-four thousand. If we allow two hundred thousand of these to be in coal and half of these in anthracite mines, that leaves one hundred thousand in bituminous mines, and as the judge closes only a majority of these, his hundreds of thousands fall to some seventy thousand. But why not close them all? While we are about it, why not make coal so cheap that nobody can afford to mine it or burn it? Do not such questions expose the utter absurdity of the ground you stand on—a basis of falsehoods from bottom to floor?

What you urge seems to be pretty much this: Pass this law and everything will be made so cheap that our great supremacy as manufacturers—which is illustrated in the fact that we hav no exports whatever of them—our great commerce—in which already little Belgium and Holland beat us—will in 1890 be nowhere; our sheep will be so cheap that poor men can no longer hav their cheap and healthful food, mutton, and several men who own millions of sheep will discharge their herdsmen, and several millions of poor men who now hav a few head will be impoverished—being tempted possibly into buying too many yards of cheap woolen goods—while coal will be made so miserably cheap the mines will mostly be closed—people refusing to use cheap coal—and Louisiana with her glorious sugar industry—but stop, let us look at that. "Louisiana's progress is proof of the vitalizing power of protection."

The judge is not quite so bad as our candidates for governor and Congress were some three years ago, each of whom actually wrote out, memorized, delivered, published, and republished speeches beginning, "The wondrous sugar industry of Louisiana, that now employs there a half-million men, and pays some ten millions in wages annually and enables them to consume Missouri's corn and pork," etc. As there were only some half-million souls in Louisiana, men, women, babes, and cripples, outside of New Orleans and some other towns, and as the ten millions in wages, though it was at the time deemed a liberal protection offer, would hardly hav satisfied the babes and cripples, if they did any work, it was so easy to expose this that nothing more was said.

Judge Kelly must hav somewhere read these speeches and received his idea of the greatness of Louisiana's sugar industry. It is true that protection has labored long and hard here; it has, for twenty years and more, done a mighty work of taxation; it has entered every house and home in all our nation, not sparing the poorest cottage or humble dug-out, and swept from the infant's platter a large part of the syrup, the sweet that the poor man's babe so dearly loves, that one thing that givs to the dry, hard crust of poverty even a delicious flavor. The sums thus taken from the masses of the people to encourage this Louisiana sugar industry were infinit; a sum uncountable; and in hardships added to the poor man's and child's lot inconceivable. And yet, with all this protection in Louisiana, she has never been able, to this day, to raise over half as much sugar as she did in 1853, nor any more than she raised forty years ago under free trade with cheaper sugars rolling in upon her from the Indies! Just take the United States census for 1880, in the American Almanac, a most exact authority, and see. She produced 449,000 hogsheads in 1853, and little over 200,000 any year under protection, rarely over 70,000.

Protection is tax and difficulty. Tax hampers labor finally, no matter where you first impose it.

Look at our tobacco tax—a thing ridiculous if for revenue. But monopoly was the object, not revenue. Never was such monstrous folly conceived. Still, men who make such statements may possibly believe their law was a revenue law. It taxed the product some eight times its proper cost! As a result, while in 1859 we produced over four hundred million pounds of tobacco and ought to make now over two billion pounds, we make no more than we did. Every taxed thing grows small or grows stuntedly in proportion. The lower the tax, the higher the revenue, from all popular consumables. And yet these men go on year after year in the same course. HOLT.

Reality Not as Horrid as Fiction.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Rev. Mr. Davidson, a professional revivalist, has just closed a series of meetings in our neighboring city of Rockford, making many converts and pocketing $600. One of his sensational discourses was entitled, "Hell, A Terrible Reality." Quoting freely from Bible texts, he proved—if the Bible is true—that hell is indeed a terrible reality. Another one of his expostulations he headed, "Where Will You Spend Eternity?" in which sermon he insisted that "none but Christians can look forward with hope and happiness."

The following letter was written in reply, and the Register, a more than average liberal daily, published about half of it under the title of "A Scientific Denial of Hell," omitting the more aggressiv and radical portions. Knowing your readers not to fear hell unabridged, I submit to you the original.

W.

MR. EDITOR: "Hell!" What nonsense! There is no hell, and I can prove it. I simply deny it. Call upon those affirming for proof. This not being forthcoming absolutely proves the denial.

But there are millions who, having inherited a faith the basis of which is a literal burning hell, will not be convinced that a simple denial extinguishes these miraculous eternal-burning flames. They take for granted the authoritativ character of the Bible and their priests, and fervently believe the monstrous doctrin, not realizing that hell is the priest's stock in trade to paralyze their intellect, enslave their manhood, and rob them of their money.

There is no hell. There never was a hell. There never can be a hell.

I might stop right here, and all thoughtful minds, weighing the evidence submitted to establish a hell, would instantly pronounce the case in my favor, a hell not proven, and consider my simple denial sufficient to prove the negativ, precisely as a simple denial of dragons, mermaids, or centaurs is ample proof that such creatures do not exist, unless, indeed, those affirming supply proof. But even to those demanding proof from those denying a hell (which, however, they inconsistently ignore from those affirming) I think I can prove as plainly as any negativ can be proven—viz., that twice two is not five—that a hell and all it implies is an absolute impossibility.

Language is inadequate to properly define the horrible blight produced throughout the world by this monstrous superstition. It is emphatically the most damnable and most virulent curse infecting humanity. It has haunted millions in the past, and is the terror of the living to-day. It has transformed conditions of content and happiness to one of wretchedness and horror. It has crushed out manhood, dwarfed the intellect, mocked reason, and dragged what might hav been a free and happy people down to the level of wretched slaves. Like a deadly incubus it has stifled them intellectually, wrecked them socially, frightened them religiously, and distressed them financially. Once a slave to this horrible illusion, the victim is every ready to sacrifice his manhood upon the altar of a revengeful God, and to lay his hard-earned cash at the feet of priest or preacher, to save him from his terrible impending doom.

To crush out this monstrous lie, to extirpate this fabulous monstrosity, born of cunning and crime, is the loftiest mission of man.

But the task is an extremely difficult one. The combined influences of the churches energetically oppose this radical reform. Their very existence depends on hell. Exterminate hell and you exterminate Christianity, and priests and preachers would hav to work ten hours a day like other poor men, or beg or starve. "Christ died to save sinners from hell." If there is no hell, his death, of course, was a cruel sacrifice, Christ is not needed, the Bible is a lie, and all churches sad monuments of a hoary superstition.

But, thank fortune! nature is not as cruel as man, reality not as horrid as fiction. There is no hell! There can be no hell! Let us rejoice!

Hell is a logical absurdity, an irrational monstrosity, and a natural impossibility.

Science affirms there is no such place in the earth, on the earth, over the earth, or under the earth. There can be no such place.

Science predicates that there is no proof, direct or indirect, from observation or analogy, from deduction or induction, of such a place or condition anywhere beyond the world, throughout the infinit realms of the universe.

Science also affirms that a human being cannot die and still liv, much less leave this world's atmosphere and survive.

Reason and logic prove there can be no such place. Hell, if it means anything, means an eternal lake or ocean of fire. But fire implies combustion; combustion necessitates a continuous supply of something to consume. If the theory of hell according to the Bible is true, there are already ten millions of centillions of human creatures roasting in hell, the vast majority of which hav been there for centuries! But the fires must be big enough for many times as many more! Where does the necessary fuel come from? Hell and all it implies would necessitate an immense, unthinkable, continuous, eternal supply, or indeed the fires would burn out instantly. Why, the biggest coal trust in the world could not supply fuel sufficient to last a single day!

Hell, if real, would be but a vast crematory furnace, in which no being could possibly liv a moment.

"Hell!" What nonsense! The most hideous, pernicious, and, at the same time, the most ridiculous, phantasmagoria ever concocted in human brain.

Who can believe the grotesque lie, the barbarous folly, when a true conception of the idea in realistic vividness dawns upon his mind? No one.

Beecher, in righteous indignation, from Plymouth pulpit proclaimed, "It is a monstrous doctrin!" and Drs. Thomas, Swing, Savage, and thousands of others of the best minds within the church, though sadly inconsistent, now echo the sentiment, "There is no hell!"

"Where will you spend eternity?"

Why, in precisely the same place and condition where and in which we spent the eternity before we were born.

In precisely the same condition in which the countless millions, not yet born, are to-day.

Life is but a flash between the eternity of beginningless time in the past and the eternity of endless time in the future. All forms are finite—begin and must end. The vast aggregation of cosmic matter alone is infinit and eternal. Nature is like a vast kaleidoscope in perpetual motion—the detail ever changing, the grand whole forever the same. If but one soul were cast into a hell every million of years, there to remain forever, and this process were repeated infinitly in the future, behold! soon, comparativly speaking, there would be no universe, but every atom now composing it would, in the shape of a wretched soul, be roasting in hell forever and ever!

Every atom composing man is but borrowed for a brief period, and the perpetuity of nature depends upon every particle returning to the source whence it came.

Who will affirm that it is a calamity that future generations are not among the living to-day? Who mourns for them? Who, of the many priests, ever dreams of uttering a single prayer in behalf of the salvation of the unborn?

Not one! Why, then, in the name of reason, worry about the dead, who sleep the blessed sleep that knows no awaking to pangs of grief and pain, and whose condition is identical with that of those as yet not born?

Annihilation implies eternal repose, nothing more. To past and future generations alike non-existence is a condition of indifference and negation. They who are not feel not, see not, hear not, remember not. Then, how in the world can death be a condition of dread and horror?

To mourn over the fate of the countless dead implies a desire or a duty likewise to mourn over the countless millions destined to be born hereafter!

What folly!

Did it ever occur to our religious friends that the desire and belief of an immortal life was born of pure egotism? John Brown, and Peter Smith, die and are soon forgotten; maybe you attend their funeral, and, maybe, shed a tear, but soon after go your way rejoicing. Not so much of a calamity after all! But it is only your individual fate you dread above all other. Ah, there is the rub! But, my friends, please consider that you are no more to your neighbors, and to the world at large, than they were to you, and that when you die the calamity is no greater, and soon the world will go on rejoicing just the same.

"Only Christians can look forward with happiness."

What mockery! Such persons either are not Christians or do not realize what Christianity teaches.

Think of that caravan of doomed ones who are daily rushing, crushing, headlong over that "broad way" into the seething crater of hell into eternal torment, while only here and there "one of the select" scrambles and struggles along that "thorny and narrow path" into heaven! Think of it! Realize the full import of the sentence pronounced upon humanity by their creator, and then tell me if you can liv and die happy believing this! Tell me. No matter what the degree of your piety or goodness during life, what assurance hav you that your capricious God, who first made hell, knowing that a vast majority of his children would there meet their terrible fate, will not, for some trifling cause, consign you to eternal torment also—or, if not you, the wife or children you love, without whose happiness yours would be impossible? Tell me, my friend, do you honestly believe that you could be happy in heaven, even a single moment, knowing those you love to be eternally in hell?

Nonsense! The hope and happiness of the true Christian is a mockery and a farce. He may whistle like the school-boy when crossing a graveyard at night, to keep his courage up, but if he realizes the full intent and meaning of his impending doom, he must be miserable and wretched indeed!

Happiness on earth or in heaven is an utter impossibility as long as the fires of an eternal hell are supposed to scorch the flesh of a single human being.

Away, then, with the shocking burlesque and the infamous lie!

To create men, knowingly subjecting them to a fate like this, would disgrace Satan.

From the Union Secretary.

Charles Watts, of Toronto, editor of Secular Thought, concluded a course of three lectures for the Chicago Secular Union Monday night. His subject Sunday morning was, "Freethought, its Nature and Influence;" in the evening, "The Church and Modern Thought," and Monday evening he devoted himself to a consideration of the "Christian Evidences." These lectures, for incisiv argument, masterly erudition, ponderous logic, and finished rhetoric, are events long to be remembered in the calends of the Forum. The Times gave excellent reports, and the Tribune complimentary notices. Several members desired that an evangelical gentleman, Mr. Morgan, who is a regular attendant at our meetings, should be pitted in debate against Mr. Watts, but the society regarded him as no match for the shafts of England's orator and keen debater. On Monday night the gentleman was allowed to reply to the lecturer, but as he did not present even the suspicion of an argument, merely reiterating that old story of a fearful example, and "what Jesus has done for me," I could scarcely anticipate how Mr. Watts was to reply to this vacuity. Mr. Watts, however, made one of the most convincing and crushing retorts ever listened to, in the most amiable and good-natured style imaginable, which was accepted with good grace by Mr. Morgan, who is not a bigot, and whose deportment is always that of the perfect gentleman. Everyone could imagin from that exhibition what Mr. Watts would be capable of with an opponent of greater caliber.

Mr. B. F. Underwood, late editor of the Open Court, at present editor of the Chicago Graphic, attended two of Mr. Watts's lectures, and on Monday evening was called out during the discussion. In response, Mr. Underwood philosophically considered the mental condition of persons who, to become decent members of society, had to hav "the love of Jesus," or some other peculiar mental aberration, and showed that, in their stage of development, it was not well for Liberals to attempt to suddenly unsettle their primitiv conceptions, assuming that such individuals were not prepared for the altruistic attitude of Liberalism. Mr. Underwood's remarks were heartily applauded.

Mr. Watts informs me that parties in Kansas hav written him for lectures. If other engagements can be arranged, he will be there in June; otherwise he will hav to defer his visit. Let friends in Kansas address him at once.

CASH COST OF A SOUL.

Despite the avowed mission of Christianity to call sinners to repentance, and save their never-dying souls, the practical tendency of this irreverent age is noticeable in thrusting forward the inquiry as to how much this sort of merchandise costs in sordid dollars and cents, and what is its marketable value. To this peculiar inquiry the Chicago evening News givs heed—but do not imagin that our pious contemporary would approach this subject with any but the profoundest religious reverence—and to its issue of Wednesday last I am indebted for the figures. What their ulterior object can be in this matter I know not; possibly to get the brethren "to pool their issues" and set up a grand salvation trust company, so that gospel restorativs for penitent thieves and pious murderers may be under proper control, and only divine members of the ordained "racket" be entitled to rebates. But the most singular part of this inquiry is the candor of the pastors, who practically acknowledge that money—"the root of all evil"—is the very basis of their success or failure, not the supposed "power of God's word." To the unprejudiced thinker this would seem satisfactory proof that the almighty appears to "take little stock" in the boom that is based so much on dollars. It may be of interest to THE TRUTH SEEKER readers to know how little filthy lucre is required to rope in the average Chicago sinner to the fold of the Lord. Of course, the churches hav not kept their statistics in such manner as to make "figuring down fine" on souls infallible, but the estimates are furnished by editors of religious papers, preachers, and laymen directly interested in home missionary enterprises. The invariable inquiry presented to them was in substance: "How much does it cost the church to make one convert?" None knew exactly or approximately, but by a comparison of all the answers given the statistical pyramid here given is constructed.

It will be seen that the church working on the cheapest scale—which in trade-union parlance would be the "scab" concern—is the Methodist. Making a calculation, based on the number of adults added to the church each year, and the amount of cash expended in Chicago, it costs but $25 to add one member to the Methodist faith—a faith that requires no facts, which suggests a low state of intelligence in science and ethics. The per capita tax on members of this Methodist conference will run over $1 this year, but its peculiar fiscal policy makes it financially very effectiv.

Baptists come a little higher—$5 for bathing or sprinkling is rather steep—but they get there all the same.

Congregationalism spends more than either of the two previously named, but as it is an approach to the cruelties of Calvinism, it takes a little more expenditure of cash to satisfy the cupidity of the people who profess to believe it, so $45 is the average outlay on a convert.

Presbyterians come still higher, as $60 is their quotation. In speaking of this disparity, one of their preachers is quoted as saying: "I believe it is true that it costs three times as much money, if you want to put it that way, to add a member to our church as it does to add one to either the Methodist or the Baptist faith, but you must remember, on the other hand, that when a man becomes a Presbyterian once he stays a Presbyterian. We do the work once for all, while some of our brethren hav to convert their converts three or four times over before the work is really done. That may account for the great difference in the figures to a certain extent." Presbyterianism does not make so many converts in Chicago; our people draw the line at roast pork.

Episcopalian converts are dearly bought, as they figure on $300 for each adult added to the church from the outside, but their growth is, as with the Lutherans and Roman Catholics, more from within than without—that is, their additions are made principally from the children born of church-members rather than from outsiders; hence, the figures for those three faiths are apt to be somewhat misleading, as it is certain the Lutherans and Catholics are growing rapidly in this community, but for additional conversions it is presumed the figures presented are tolerably correct.

Adding up results, and figuring the cost of saving souls down fine, it will be seen that the average Chicago sinner, over whom there must be quite a hubbub in heaven, if the rejoicing is in proportion to his worldly wickedness, just foots up $39.4236—a circumstance which permits of another comparison.

In Smalley's "Cost of the Gospel," it is said, after an exhaustiv comparison of the religious work of the world, the outlay required to bring a convert into one of the reformed Christian churches in each case was:

An African	$14	A Japanese	$ 80
An Italian	42	A Chinese	100
A Spaniard	55	A Jew	2,800
An East Indian	60

So that Chicagoans, who are guaranteed, all-round sinners, are quite cheap at $40.

It would be much more interesting to the Liberals of this country if the Daily News would procure the statistics as to how much these denominations and their charities cost the community at large and estimate how much the public hav to contribute, in exemption of church property, to their propaganda work. If some of our office-holders had kept their promis I should hav had this information for the American Secular Union long ago, but this is presidential year and politicians are afraid to pull a string if thereby they might lose the vote on the other end.

Evangelist Kirkland, who furnishes salvation and free lunch to a large mission of blear-eyed, badly perfumed, and carnation-nosed tramps, claims he can convert at an expenditure of $1 a head. Guess he means they can convert his sandwiches into temporary saints. He admits they are not converted to any special form of creed, but are got away from the gutters and saloons. Let me assure your readers that the odor arising from these sanctified ones is not of the "incense-breathing morn" order, and could be purified by a little of the saloon atmosphere. Others estimate that an average expenditure of $8,000 for undenominational mission work is made in Chicago, and that eleven thousand a year of converts are secured—at any rate, as long as cold weather and free lunches last. Yes, this is cheap, dirt cheap—but rather dear for dirt.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

The Recent Woman's Council.

I hav been a good deal disturbed by the reports of this famous gathering of women at Washington, our nation's capital, and hav several times taken my pen in hand to inquire how it happened that Helen Gardener's essay was entirely ignored in the stenographic reports, though the program had announced her name and subject in as large letters as any of the other expected speakers. I could not think that ill health had prevented the delivery, as we should hav seen a notice of that certainly in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but at last the editorial of May 5th explains the mystery. Miss Gardener is an Infidel, and the Christian, as far as possible, ignores the existence of such persons. I perhaps hav no right to criticise the power which governed that congress of women, nevertheless I must say, as I certainly feel that I should be remiss in my duty to the cause of woman if I did not, that it was the duty of some one in power there to giv a report of that speech to the public as of the other speeches. The prayer (or invocation, as it was called) given at every session was fully reported, and I presume no one protested against it; though to an Infidel's eyes it seemed profane, as the persons uttering those invocations were all professed Christians, and Jesus of Nazareth is reported as expressly forbidding public prayer; and even without that prohibition, would it seem proper to anyone who had ever given a thought to the subject to publish the humble petition of a subject to an infinit being to the world, to be admired or criticised, as the case might be, for its beautiful construction or weak simplicity?

I am glad that Miss Anthony remembered—how could she forget, being a birthright Quaker?—that the good Lucretia Mott did not find it necessary to make a place for audible prayer in the meetings over which she presided. There were certainly a great many good things said for the cause of woman at that meeting, but I am not encouraged by it, as I hoped to be. Superstition is a very large ingredient in our government, and is the cause of many of the cruelties and wrongs which are inflicted upon those who through misfortune or ignorance transgress the laws, and added superstition is not desirable. Nevertheless, I know that suffrage for woman is right, even though it bring added tyranny, as suffrage is right for the emancipated Southern slave, even though his ignorance is greatly in the way of improvement to the government. The manhood with which suffrage has invested him will help to giv him a taste and determination to be in reality a man; so the sex slave will learn through enfranchisment what real, responsible womanhood may become. I thank you, Mr. Editor, that you hav given to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER Miss Gardener's admirable paper, "Sex in Brain." It seems to be as difficult to discover the sex in brain as it is for some Liberal writers to find the time of the birth of the mind or soul; but no doubt our good brothers the medical and physiological teachers will still declare it is there, until the fable shall be entirely forgotten by the scholar.

Editorial Notes.

THE Rev. James H. Hoadley, of this city, desires the money spent by church charitable organizations in relieving the physical distress of the poor, disbursed to ministers who shall preach to them instead of feeding them. "What is wanted," he says, "is more gospel and less charity; more spiritual and less temporal help. The gospel is what the poor need to-day more than anything else. It will not always relieve them of their poverty, nor make them rich in temporal things; but it will make them 'rich toward God,' which, after all, is the only true riches." The Rev. Mr. Hoadley seems to be a Christian.

A REV. MR. BOULAND, living in Lafayette place, this city, has withdrawn from the Roman Catholic church, by letter to the pope, and will unite with the Episcopalians. The gaudiness of the marble-fronted building across the street, bought with Catherine Wolfe's cash, was too much for Mr. Bouland, who is a Frenchman, with a Frenchman's love of finery. In closing his letter to the pope, Monsignor Bouland writes these titles after his name: "Honorary Private Chamberlain of his Holiness, Leo XIII.; Honorary Canon of St. Michael Archangelo, Rome; Honorary Canon of the Metropolitan Church of Rheims; Commander of the Order of the Holy Sepulcher; Member of the Academie des Arcades, and President General of the Society of the Avocats de St. Pierre in North America." The Catholic Union and Times says: "According to the story told by the New York Catholic News, 'Mgr.' Bouland is a disreputable adventurer whose titles are as worthless as his character. The Protestant Episcopal Bishop Potter is heartily welcome to the 'accession.'" All we can say is, that it's funny that Mr. Bouland's general disreputableness was not sooner discovered by the church authorities who hav been loading him with shining if unsubstantial honors.

THE following bill has been introduced in the House of Representativs by Amos Cummings, of this city, and referred to the committee on post-offices and post-roads: "Whereas it was not the intention, and the Constitution does not provide for, the enforcement of common morality by the general government within the states; and whereas the states in their severalties hav supreme authority over questions of common morality, and are competent to deal with them; and whereas the exercise of powers not definitly conferred is usurpation, tends to centralization, despotism, and destruction of liberty; and whereas the exercise of such powers tends to encourage disrespect for organic compacts and statutes, and strikes at the foundations of society; and whereas Section 3,893 of Revised Statutes and the amendment of July 12, 1876, are without constitutional authority, are ambiguous in expression, and therefore of doubtful interpretation, hav been greatly abused, are being abused now, and are liable to greater abuse: Therefore, be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representativs of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that Section 3,893 of Revised Statutes, and all the amendments thereto, be, and they are hereby, repealed. Sec. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage."

IN the House of Commons, last week, Mr. Bradlaugh defeated Sir John Lubbock's bill to close the stores in England at 8 o'clock on every night but Saturday, when keeping open till 10 o'clock was to be allowed. Mr. Bradlaugh denounced the bill as absolutely immoral in principle and absurd in detail. He upheld shorter hours of labor for everyone, but if Parliament should set itself to dictate the hours of labor for every industry in the country they would hav legislation of a most terrific character—legislation that would crush personal energy and enterprise, ruin trade, and pervert and weaken individual character. The bill was rejected by a vote of 273 to 95. Mr. Bradlaugh has also used his Parliamentary position to stop the sale of lottery tickets by a church club, and to set the police after the pious lawbreakers. In the National Reformer of the 22d ult., the non-oathable member of Parliament sends his greetings to American friends in these words: "I thank both the New York TRUTH SEEKER and the Boston Investigator for their very congratulatory notices of my work, and in return send across the Atlantic to them, and to American friends, greetings, which I may never perhaps find the opportunity to renew in person, but which are none the less hearty in that they are sent from afar off."

THE Japanese do not take kindly to Christianity. They are burdened with too soft hearts. A missionary, who evidently is tainted with the Andover heresy, says: "They grieve over the fate of their departed children, parents, and relativs, and often show their grief by tears. They ask us if there is any hope, any way to free them by prayer from that eternal misery, and I am obliged to answer there is absolutely none. Their grief at this affects and torments them wonderfully; they almost pine away with sorrow. They often ask if God cannot take their father out of hell, and why their punishment must never hav an end; and they do not cease to grieve." It requires a hard nature to believe in Calvinistic theology, and we do not think that Japan will ever hang as a trophy at the belt of Protestant warriors, like a scalp on an Indian's leggings. The Christian Union admits the sense of disappointment felt at the non-success of Christian missions in the East, and though the Independent denies the failure, the prevailing opinion regarding them is that they are so weak, and the missionaries so contemptible in action, that they incur only the contempt of the nativs. And why should they not? The doctrins are infinitly cruel and repugnant to kindly disposed people, are supported at best by guess-work only, and the missionaries who trade for profit as zealously as they pray for sinners are not the sort of men to win respect anywhere. The Christian missionary system is a gigantic fraud.

MR. ELLIOTT F. SHEPARD, the pious editor who prints each day a text of scripture at the head of his editorial columns, and who desires the Fifth avenue stages to stop running on Sunday, has become the laughing-stock of the town. The latest joke upon him is the appearance of the following in the Evening Post and Commercial Advertiser. It is directed "To the officers, directors, and stockholders of the Fifth Avenue Transportation Company—Gentlemen: The undersigned take leave to remonstrate against the running of your stages on SATURDAY. It is very disagreeable to many of the residents on that route. It is injurious to the drivers and starters, requiring them to work on the seventh day of the week, and it tends to break down the sanctity of the day, which in the Fourth Commandment is appointed to be kept holy, and thus do a great harm to the best interests of the whole community. True, there are many who ride to and from places of worship on that day, and also many who do not believe in the religious observance of that day, who visit the public parks with their wives and little ones for one day's recreation out of seven; still, these facts ought not to weigh against the annoyance of the wealthy residents of the brown stone mansions on the route of these stages, for surely what 'rights' that these residents 'are bound to respect' can those hav who liv elsewhere than on Fifth avenue? The pavements of that avenue 'of churches and of homes' should never be polluted on that sacred day by the tread of horses drawing stages that carry passengers for a five-cent fare, but should be reserved exclusivly for carriages with coachmen and footmen in livery. Nor should the larger number, who do not regard the Sabbath as a sacred day, be allowed to 'injure the feelings' of the pious few who do so regard it. We earnestly call upon you to put a stop to the 'illegal, immoral, and irreligious' practice of running your stages on Saturday. And, further, we venture to suggest that all of your stages be furnished with a fresh text of scripture each day, conspicuously displayed. Signed by forty residents of the 'side' streets."

THE following letter, no matter how obtained, probably fairly represents the aims and hopes of the National Reform Association, or God-in-the-Constitution party: "Dear Sir: In reply to your letter asking what the National Reform Association expects to accomplish, I would say, that while there is some difference among the members, some being unwilling to go so far as others, yet I am not without warrant in affirming that the larger number, including most of the leaders, are impressed with the necessity of making this country and nation thoroughly Christ's; by which I mean such, in Constitution and laws, that no one shall dare to dispute a single one of the doctrins of the Nicene creed; while an inner circle hav settled it that when this has been obtained a further step will be attempted and (it is confidently hoped) carried to incorporate in the Constitution the Athanasian creed in a body. We hav seen that there is a sentiment among the well-to-do that it is highly respectable for anyone, as soon as he gets up a little in the world, to hav a pew in some church. This sentiment makes vast numbers support the churches, even when they hav no real faith in what they hear there; they wish to be on the fashionable side and to keep solid with the church people, and so if Mr. Reynolds or Mr. Ingersoll utters such a thought as is opposed to the doctrin of the trinity, for instance, let us say, it is quite easy for Comstock or some other servant of the Lord to get a dozen country clowns to say that he has been guilty of blasphemy and obscenity. It matters not that the words according to the dictionary are about as applicable as if it were called burglary; no one wants to go against the church, you know! To be sure, no one should be punished for freely uttering what he thinks, but—well! this is, or ought to be, a Christian country. Now, it is upon this fact, viz., that there are so many voters who care for no object farther off than an inch beyond their noses, that we base our hopes of being able to shut up the mouths not only of Atheists, but also of Universalists, Unitarians, and all whom we consider unorthodox. And to tell you the truth, I shall never be satisfied until these United States are acknowledgedly and stringently Calvinistic. There may be some tough work, some bloodshed, torturing, and many battles between different religious denominations, but there will be no peace, depend upon it, even after God is put in the Constitution, till Athanasius has triumphed over all. We will use the more moderate, worldly, and rationalistic church people just as far as they will go, and then we will turn our weapons against them as godless heretics, reconcilers of religion and the Bible with science, and rank Freethinkers; we will hav thinking stopped, and faith made compulsory. Then, and not till then, shall the earth be covered with the glory of the Lord (or Athanasius), as the waters cover the sea. Yours in the bonds of Jesus. F. J. C." The reference to Mr. Reynolds's case in the foregoing may be explained by the fact that the letter was written by a Jerseyman, living not a thousand miles from Morristown.

Gladstone's Disappointing Essay.

The North American Review for May opens with an elaborate paper from the pen of Mr. Gladstone entitled, "Colonel Ingersoll on Christianity." In one view there is nothing remarkable in the coupling of these two names. Each is beyond question the supreme orator of his country. No American now living can lay claim to an eloquence comparable to that of Colonel Ingersoll, neither can any Englishman now before the public claim comparison with Mr. Gladstone in power to hold au audience. But here the resemblance ceases. The two men are otherwise about as unlike as nature and circumstances could hav made them if conspiring to that end as the main object in view. Mr. Gladstone has been a conspicuous figure in the public life of England for a great many years, and his power is marvelous, but he never relieves the seriousness of discussion with a laugh or anything approaching it. One cannot conceive of him as having a humorous side to his nature. Colonel Ingersoll, on the contrary, is quick to see the ludicrous side of a thing and apt in its characterization. That two men so utterly unlike should agree in anything is hardly to be expected. But apart from natural difference, they occupy irreconcilably opposit positions in their religious views. It is well known in a general way that Mr. Gladstone is a devout man, cherishing special veneration for the Christian religion, while Colonel Ingersoll is a pronounced Agnostic.

Mr. Gladstone's article shows great ability, but it is not a little disappointing. It is devoted to the criticism of detached bits of Ingersoll's reply to Dr. Field, but fails to giv much idea of what Mr. Gladstone's own views are. For example, Ingersoll referred to Shakspere as "by far the greatest of the human race," and Gladstone takes him to task for saying it. "I do not feel entitled to assert that he is not, but how vast and complex a question is here determined for us in this airy manner!" Evidently the writer's main object was to protest against the Ingersoll method rather than idea. He credits the American iconoclast with candor and upright intentions, but he doesn't like what he calls "the flashing coruscations which really compose the shafts of the articles." He finds fault with Ingersoll for not "formulating his animadversions." In another place he calls him a mitrailleuse, and says his writings leave on his mind the impression of a battle-field, when, as he thinks, "controversy ought to be waged after the pattern of those engagements where a chosen champion on either side, in a space carefully limited and reserved, does battle on behalf of each silent and expectant host." Sullivan and Mitchell, rather than Achilles and Hector, would seem to be the Gladstonian patterns for theological debate.

All this is matter of taste and temperament. It is to be regretted that the great English statesman did not dispose of that immaterial phase of the subject in a few sentences, and then giv the public his ideas on Christianity in a succinct and satisfactory manner. As it is, we get nothing except as an incident to criticism. The nearest approach to an exception is in the Darwinian line. Mr. Ingersoll casually remarked that "his (Darwin's) discoveries, carried to their legitimate conclusion, destroy the creeds and sacred scriptures of mankind." That observation brings out several pages of really interesting discussion. Mr. Gladstone does not venture an opinion as to the soundness of Darwin's theory, but he does stoutly maintain that it might be true without impairing the claim of the Bible to be regarded as an inspired volume, which is certainly a material point.

The June number of this magazine is expected to contain a reply from Ingersoll. It is a remarkable fact that these two famous laymen should be engaged in a purely theological discussion. A Chicago clergyman said last Sunday that the Ingersoll-Field discussion was the most important recent event in the religious world; but it is still more notable that the Grand Old Man has been drawn into the great debate. It is earnestly to be hoped that he will not stop until he has passed from criticism of ways and means to the unfolding of his own religious ideas.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

Slate-Writing.

DEAR MRS. SLENKER: In your last letter to me you said:

No, I can't believe in independent slate-writing. I wish thee would go to a medium and take thy own slates. Mark the frames, and tie them thyself, and keep hold of them all the time. Try and get some slates different from others. I tried that, but Caffray would not use my slates at all. I had to take his or go without any writing. I shall be ever so glad if thee can do this. I don't know who I would better trust to do it, well, honestly, carefully. I'd gladly pay the expense or go myself if I was there. Thee has no idea how this subject interests me. I can't think of anything I'd sooner hav thee do for me.

Yesterday, just three weeks from the date of that letter, I visited Mr. Keeler, the medium. I never saw him but once before, and that was in a public room where he gave a few tests. I was in a remote part of the room, and never would hav recognized him again. It is scarcely possible that he ever saw me before I called on him.

I had bought two slates, washed and marked them. Besides certain marks already on them by which I could identify them, I cut with a knife initial letters of my name on the inner edges of the frames—i. e., W. H. B. on one and W. on the other. These letters could of course be seen on close inspection.

I did not go by appointment. Two women were having a sitting, and I had to wait a few minutes. Mr. Keeler said, "You happen to hav come at a time when I can giv you a sitting." It was near 1 o'clock and he had an appointment at 2. I could hear the two women talking in the back room. They were getting communications. Soon the sliding door opened and they came out into the parlor where I was. One had slates wrapped in a paper. "Was your communication satisfactory?" I inquired. The elder of the two replied, "Oh, perfectly; I would not take a hundred dollars for what I hav got here."

I sat down by a little table. The sun shone in through the south window, and the room was very light. I asked Mr. Keeler if it was right for me to bring the slates. "Certainly," said he. I took off the wrapper, and he made a few passes over them with crumpled paper, as if to rub out any marks that might be there. The slates were never for an instant out of my sight.

Mr. Keeler wrote something on a little piece of paper, which I understood to be the names of spirit messengers. Folding the paper tightly and laying it on the table, he handed me a little tablet, with a request that I write to several spirit friends, male and female. He sat opposit to me, and as I wrote I held my left hand over the tablet so that he could not see my writing. On one slip of paper I addressed Thomas Paine, of whom I made some inquiries, signing my name. This paper I folded up several times, making a wad. On another slip I addressed my sister, Selina S. (Burr) Churchill, and my brother, David M. Burr, asking for a communication, and signing myself, "Your brother." On a third slip I addressed Chs. L. Alexander, signing my name. On a fourth I wrote as follows:

Elmina D. Slenker, I know you don't believe in slate-writing, but being in the body, possibly there is a psychological power in you which you are not aware of.

This I signed with my name, and all four of the closely folded slips I placed on the table before me, with the one put there by Mr. Keeler, and they were mixed up so that I could not tell one from the other.

I waited some time for the influence, conversing with Mr. Keeler, but giving him no clue to names or anything else. Presently he said, "I feel a very strange influence, as if carried far away." Then the door opened, and his wife and little child entered with a telegram. "That telegram," said I, "may cause the strange feeling." "No," said he, after opening and reading it, "it requires no answer." And his wife and child withdrew.

Then he said, "I hav an impression of the letters s and r." I told him I could not understand that at all. Again he said, "Take up one of the papers." I took one and held it, not knowing which of the five it was. "I hav an impression," said he, "that the last letter of the first name in that paper is s, and the last letter of the last name is r." I opened the paper, and the name was Charles L. Alexander. I did not read the name aloud, but presently he said, "It is Charles."

Then he took one of my slates and began to write on it, saying, "This is not what you come for, but I am impelled to write." And as he wrote I held, at his request, another of the papers taken up at random. "Hold it tightly," said he, and as he wrote he read to me as follows from the slate, I taking it down in shorthand:

The person whose name he now holds does not seem to be in our condition of life. I am not able to find her in any of the realms I hav passed through. Will look a few minutes more, but do not think the person is with us.

I opened the paper and it was addressed to Elmina D. Slenker. I then told him it was a woman, but never gave him your name. Then he added in writing:

The lady is alive and well, and in the soul.

All this occurred before the slate-writing test, which was as follows:

Nipping off a bit of slate pencil, he gave it to me to hold a few moments. Then he put it between the two slates before my eyes. What he himself had written I saw him rub off before coming to the test. The slates were clear as he put them together. At his request I tied my handkerchief around them, all the time holding in my left hand one of the folded papers. Then we both held the slates elevated a few inches above the table. Presently I could hear faint scratching; then, when the message appeared to be completed, I heard two or three taps, apparently of the bit of slate pencil. But in another moment Mr. Keeler reversed the slates and what appeared to be another message was written; this being completed like the other, only in a bolder manner, judging by the noise of the pencil.

On opening the slates there were two communications written—one from my sister, Selina S. Churchill, and the other from Charles L. Alexander, both in characteristic handwriting—not an exact facsimile, but nearly so. My sister died in 1851, and Mr. Alexander in 1880.

From Thomas Paine I got no communication. I never named him, and was told that the person had been too long dead. I admitted that I did not know him in life, and then Mr. Keeler said, "His name is Paine."

So you see that I got direct answers in writing signed by three of the persons I named, but not from Paine nor from yourself. But what I did get about you is to me the most interesting part of the performance. I apologized to Mr. Keeler for the innocent fraud, and he took it good-naturedly.

Do you ask me if there is not room for fraud in these performances? I answer, not unless my senses deceive me. I know the slate-writing trick is done in public by Harry Kellar, the prestidigitator. But this same Kellar, in a letter to the Indian Daily News, dated January 25, 1882, described certain manifestations which he had witnessed at the residence of a private gentleman of Calcutta the evening previous, through the mediumship of Mr. Eglinton, and concluded as follows:

I still remain a skeptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must hav been an intelligent force that produced the writing on that slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight-of-hand.

Mr. Kellar's slate-writing is acknowledged by him to be a sleight-of-hand performance. Not so Mr. Keeler's. Kellar, the prestidigitator, was unable to discover any trickery or sleight-of-hand in the mediumistic performance of Mr. Eglinton, nor was I able to discover any in that of Mr. Keeler. I am, therefore, firmly convinced that there must hav been an intelligent force that produced the writing on those slates. W. H. BURR.

Washington, D. C., April 19, 1888.

P.S.—April 23d. I find that I was mistaken about having seen Mr. Keeler before. It was another medium that I saw giving tests after a lecture.

The Dead are Forever Dead.

A friend says: "I think every student of nature must admit there is a better, a nobler, a purer, and more exalted existence for us after this life of toil, of suffering, and disappointment is over. We see the flowers in their beauty droop, fade, and die, yet we know that spring's warm breath will bring them back to life again . . . there must be a grand, a glorious, a never-ending life of happiness after this brief existence terminates."

The above ideas are the outgrowth of heredity, environment, and education. A little broader outlook will show us that all "students of nature" do not admit that there is a better existence for us in some unknown future. Darwin alone is ample proof of this, and few hav studied nature more closely than this great and good evolutionist did. Then, there are Tyndall and Huxley and a host of lesser lights who discern in life only a continual process or series of changes, of renewed births and deaths, no one identity being eternal and everlasting; no one death being followed by a resurrection of the self-same individual.

I do not deny the suffering and disappointments, the sorrows and crimes, of life, but I say with Darwin that justice, right, goodness, and happiness are the prevailing rule and their opposits are the exceptions.

It is really no argument at all that life is an imperfect or undesirable boon unless it culminates in perfection here or hereafter, for we cannot conceive of any condition where there is a possibility of perfect peace, love, joy, or satisfaction, and indeed some thinkers go so far as to say that perfection must inevitably end in incapacity and worthlessness.

It is the unsatisfied yearnings, strivings, and ambitions that impel us onward and upward into higher and better planes of life.

There is no good without its corresponding evil. There is no one need of the body but must become a want before we can enjoy its satisfaction.

We must hunger to enjoy food, tire to enjoy rest, thirst to enjoy drinking, and dislike to enjoy loving.

You may say, Why then battle against wrong, misery, woe, and crime? I answer, Because we must do our best to increase the good and keep in abeyance the evil. Life and happiness depend upon this. To yield submissivly to evil is to finally annihilate the race. The intense love of life insures the war against life's evils. We cannot eliminate them, but we can keep them in the minority, and are compelled to by the law of self-preservation.

The symbol of flowers dying and being brought to life by spring's warm breath is fallacious. No single flower that has ever died has bloomed again. Every death is eternal. The rose of to-day showers its petals upon the ground, perfects its seed, and is forever gone.

The parent bush may grow other sister roses, but not one of them will be the self-same rose of to-day.

The bush itself if killed will be forever dead. Some plants die down to the ground and their root or bulb sleeps till spring, but it is as truly alive as we are when we sleep at night. Dig it up and burn it, and where then is the resurrection? A seed is said to rot in the ground before it sprouts and grows. But it doesn't all rot; the germ is alive. If that dies, there will be no plant.

I hav sought earnestly for a long lifetime for barely one proof of a life to come, but hav never found it. I am ready and willing to believe if I can hav evidence.

I love life. It is a priceless blessing. But it is ours only for a time. The race livs, but individuals pass away. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Infidelity in Utah.

During the past four months the Secularists of Utah hav been enjoying a regular Freethought revival, a Liberal love-feast, so to speak. The cause has been championed by that radical and magnetic Liberal orator, Dr. J. L. York, of San José, Cal., who, four months ago, under the auspices of the Salt Lake Secular Union, began a series of lectures in this and other cities in Utah. In some respects the campaign has been the most remarkable ever conducted in this territory, if not in America—remarkable for many reasons. Dr. York came to Utah almost wholly unknown to the people, but from his initial lectures he caught the great popular heart of the masses, and, therefore, he has been the most talked-of man in Utah so far this year, his fame and the character of his work having spread to the remotest parts of the territory.

It so happened that the doctor came here in the very nick of time, as a more propitious period for the reception of Freethought teachings has never been since the settlement of the people in these valleys. To show such is the case it is but necessary to say, as regards the Mormon people, that such great changes hav taken place in their church affairs that no longer is the priestly whip held over them as in former times, and the power of the civil law has driven the leaders of this stupendous religious fraud into hiding, or compelled them to seek refuge in foreign lands. Therefore, deserted by their chiefs, whose schemes for the perpetuity of churchism hav been so grossly shameful in their character, the Mormon masses hav had their attention easily enlisted in the interests of Secularism. Another thing that has been favorable to the doctor's work is the fact that the Mormons are natural-born Freethinkers in one sense, at least, and as to all other churches thoroughly Infidel. The Saints' creed disagrees in its dogmas with all other creeds, the Bible not being the basis of its religious structure, and consequently the Mormons are distinctivly different, both in the doctrins they teach and the practices to which they adhere.

On account of these peculiar differences there is no love felt nor manifested by them for the Christian churches, they having all been classed by the Saints as worse than the Infidels. So it transpires that the Protestant and Catholic churches hav made next to no headway in converting the polygamists to their views of the religion of Jesus Christ. No wonder that Dr. York should find a field here, and the result of his labors be crowned with glorious success! Everywhere he has spoken the houses hav been crowded to overflowing, four-fifths of the audiences being of Mormon connection and affiliations. The Infidel's style and the nature of his remarks hav been like unto new revelations to the people, setting them to thinking and discussing the comparativ merits of this and that dogma and practice of the various churches. This thinking and talking one with another has led to differences of opinions and criticism, to doubt and investigation by hundreds, who, for the first time in their lives, began an honest, earnest seach after light and truth. Inspired by the grand old man's radicalism and magnetic force, men and women, varying in age, circumstances, and social conditions, hav, during these sixteen weeks, found courage to step outside the church and dash to earth the chains that so long hav held them captiv to superstition and priestcraft.

That this campaign should hav resulted in so much good is due not only to the fact that the people were found in favorable conditions for impression, but to Dr. York's manner and method of handling his subjects, which hav covered a field of thought admirably suited to the needs of the people. Loud and strong has his voice been lifted in the defense of universal mental liberty, the rights of the people, and the teachings of Secularism.

Besides the lectures in this city, Dr. York has spoken in the following towns: Provo, Springville, Payson, Murray, Hayward, Ogden, Morgan, Coatsville, Kamas, and Park City, all red-hot Mormon towns, with the exception of the last-named, the foremost mining-camp of the territory.

When the doctor first began his work, the religious people felt disposed to ignore his presence and let him and his work alone. This did not last long, and so various sky-pilots commenced Sunday-evening lectures against Infidelity, but as their methods were simply attacks on Secularists and wild assertions about what Christianity has done for the world—full of hypocrisy and sophistry—they only served to increase the public interest in the Secular movement. Not daring to do so sooner, the Deseret News, the Mormon church organ, devoted a column and a half to the doctor, after he had closed his course here. In the same priestly sheet two lay Mormons tried their hands as logicians, and succeeded in showing themselvs either knaves or fools.

Brief mention is made of these things to show that the Christian ministry and the Mormon priesthood hav been riled up beyond endurance.

That these lectures might be supplemented with suitable reading matter, a stock of Freethought literature has been kept on hand and sold by the secretary of the Union.

At the close of the doctor's course here his friends tendered him a grand public benefit and reception. The affair took place at the Opera House, Tuesday evening, April 17th, and was in every particular a most enjoyable and long-to-be-remembered occasion.

PHENIX, ARIZ, March 21st, 22d, 23d.—With sighs of regret I bade farewell to beauteous Tempe and to the kind friends, noble devotees of Liberalism, truth seekers, faithful representativs of our cause. Phenix is a wide-awake, prosperous city, with a vast extent of choice land, a fairy garden of luscious fruits and bright alfalfa fields, with thousands of acres of growing grain on every side of it. I was met at the depot by a jolly band of Liberals and escorted to the cosy home of John Burger, a pioneer of Arizona, a successful miner, and an energetic worker for Liberalism. There is a very large Liberal element of the very best material here, and much more that needs vertebral development. The beautiful and commodious Opera House was filled the first night; the second and third nights tested its seating capacity. The genial proprietor himself came to the rescue and carried in extra chairs. It is not often that so earnest a worker for others' comforts is proprietor of hall or opera house. May his shadow never grow less. It was by all conceded that the lectures awoke a very great interest. There was much talk of a discussion between myself and some very able minister who was out of town during my sojourn there. They may not arrange a debate. I expressed my willingness to return.

John Berger, that glorious veteran, I. M. Cotten, and Wm. Jensen are among the most zealous workers and burden-bearers, but all evinced the kindest desire to do everything possible to make my stay a pleasure and my labors a success. I sold a large quantity of Liberal books and pamphlets, and obtained several new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL, March 25th, 26th, 27th.—A weary ride over hundreds of miles of sandy desert. But ere I reached San Bernardino luxuriant vegetation took the place of the wind-waved sea of sand. In this city I had made the engagement to deliver my first lecture in California. I am under very great obligations to the Liberal Spiritualists of San Bernardino, and especially to the president of their association, Wm. Heap, a pioneer Liberal, an earnest Spiritualist. A more thoroughly generous-hearted, genial, jolly, old soul I never hope to meet. All that it was possible to do to help me in my work he did, and did it with a hearty kindness, as though he was all the time receiving instead of conferring favors.

All the loss and annoyance was negatived by the kind friends I made, whom I shall ever remember with affection and gratitude. Any financial loss was more than made good by that true, earnest, modest worker for reason, right, and truth, Mr. Wm. Macdonald. His name alone was a password to my regard. He takes and pays cash in advance for five copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He and his family are harmonious workers for Liberalism. Despite his Infidelity, he is loved and respected by all classes. He took me in his carriage to view San Bernardino and the surrounding country. It is a city of wondrous promis. The business men are among the most public-spirited and energetic, and, independent of its manufactories, it has a wondrously prolific, rich fairyland of grain, fruit, and flowers all around it.

RIVERSIDE, CAL.—I visited this fruit garden. It is luxuriant, but the town is in the grasp of the church, and heaven, if it existed, would hav no charms for me while it was a despotic monarchy, with twelve titled saints sitting on thrones judging all the rest. The ultra-fanatic pious are on the throne at Riverside. There are a few Liberals who, I hope, may yet effect its redemption, but $20 a night for an old barn called a pavilion, to lecture in, proves a protectiv tariff that shuts out free Liberal lectures.

SAN JACINTO, CAL., March 30th, 31st, April 1st.—The railroad deposits passengers for San Jacinto at Perris, a woebegone, sandy desert, with a few disconsolate-looking buildings. The arid waste is laid out in choice town lots by the real estate fiends. It is a wretched place to lay over at. But after a short delay the stage was ready, and at this time of year it is a very pleasant ride through the valley, more beautiful and rich in verdure with every mile of travel toward the enterprising, fast-growing city of San Jacinto. After registering at the hotel, and visiting the post-office (when thousands of miles away from home, on a lonely pilgrimage, how one does appreciate letters from loved ones!), I wandered into the carriage shop of D. W. Perkins, and in sepulchral tones, putting on a most sanctimonious visage, I asked him to "please inform me where I should find the prayer-meeting that evening." The conflicting emotions portrayed on his expressiv phiz were beyond all possibility of description. He was all broken up. His answer utterly lacked that terse diction with which he always so very promptly replies to all inquiries as to his opinions on politics or Prohibition. On making myself known I received a most cordial welcome. Friend Perkins is an earnest, conscientious Liberal, and has the courage of his convictions.

Mrs. F. Reynolds (Florence, not Frances C.) and Isaac C. Crum kindly furnished most inspiring music at each lecture. The lectures were well attended, and created very great and general interest. There are a goodly number of worthy ladies and gentlemen representativs of Liberalism at San Jacinto, and one or two that need evoluting. It does not always follow that because a person gets the God idea out of his head he has love and appreciation of the noble principles of Liberalism in his heart.

DIAMOND VALLEY, April 1st, 2d, 3d.—After the Sunday afternoon lecture Friend Perkins took me in a carriage to the Diamond Valley school-house, eight miles across the mesa. I delivered three lectures there to very small audiences, but in view of the sparse settlement, the long distance all had to come, and the dark, damp nights, larger attendance was not to be expected. The last night I had quite a goodly audience, and sold considerable literature.

I greatly enjoyed my visit at Friend P. A. Clark's. He has the largest, best, and most beautiful farm; the largest body, with still larger heart; the largest and fairest wife; the most interesting family, and the most precocious baby in the entire valley.

DEMING, April 4th.—I delivered a lecture at Deming school-house under the auspices of stanch and sturdy W. D. Clark and that noble, generous-hearted champion of Liberalism, J. S. Deming. There were a number of Christians present, and after the lecture for about two hours I answered questions and refuted false impressions. The ladies took the lead in propounding questions. All manifested interest, and I had the sweet reward of assurance from several that they had been benefited, and would read and investigate.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., April 7th, 8th.—The Liberals and Spiritualists here are united in a most effectiv and prosperous society. They hav captured the Methodist church, a large, handsome, commodious building, and are holding their regular Sunday afternoon meetings and week-night festivals in it. This has been achieved in modest silence, without buncombe or trumpet-blowing; and under the presidency of Ex-Rev. Paul Smith, a pronounced Spiritualist, but a Liberal of the noblest type, the society is growing in numbers and influence every week. President Smith's great natural ability, and culture, unvarying urbanity, and self-sacrificing devotion to the cause of Liberalism and humanity, giv him immense influence, and he uses it solely for the advancement of the cause of Freethought. He is a grand, glorious singer; to hear him taking the lead in the opening service of song is a great treat, and proves a very great attraction. The San Diego Liberal Society does not rest content with having captured the M. E. church; they hav inaugurated a free Liberal library and reading-room, and under the able and inspiring energy of that indomitable worker, Mary A. White, who acts as librarian, suitable rooms are rented, and quite a large number of books hav been collected, forming the nucleus of a Liberal and scientific library that will speedily become one of the best and most important institutions of San Diego.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Woman and the Bible.

The most obstinate difficulty to remove in the progress of Freethought is woman's inherent belief in the Bible. I think it doubtful if there be more than one woman in a hundred of her sex that has from her own convictions cut loose from all faith in the old book, and it is quite a rarity to meet with one amongst the many that shows a sign of skepticism. Their belief in holy writ has precluded all thought of investigating the absurdities of the Bible, consequently they scornfully reject even the smallest discussion on the subject. Could they admit Freethought literature in their homes, it might in many cases be the means of bringing over to Liberalism many of our intelligent women. Infidels generally are timid and fearful of consequences should they bring anything home showing signs of Infidelity likely to come under the eyes of an orthodox woman, lest it be consigned to the cook-stove—instances of the kind sometimes take place. The progress of Infidelity will eventually be retarded without the aid of women, and many are the cases where men hav zealously worked for the Liberal cause in getting up clubs and hav miserably failed for the want of women's presence at their meetings.

Men, and young men in particular, are backward in taking up and discussing Liberal and theological questions, and slow in attending Infidel meetings where there is a non-attendance of females. Now the question comes up, How are women to be released from the bondage of priestcraft and from Bible superstition?

It is beyond my ability to lay down a successful scheme to cause women to think and retrace their erroneous conceptions of theology. I can only surmise that as there are a goodly number of ably educated women ready for the lecture field, could they be induced to visit the principal cities of our country, I am most certain they could bring out a larger audience of women and convert more to our Infidel faith than could the same number of men.

There is not an intelligent student of the signs of the times but must plainly see the urgent reasons for such a movement. It is evident that woman suffrage has made rapid strides during the last five years, is now a national question, and inside the coming decade will make its triumph, and the people will say: Amen! woman has gained her rights. But we can well see future results from present causes. We know that the Prohibition cause is almost entirely the work of the church. The reënactment of the puritanical Sunday laws, and, more and worse, the putting of God and Jesus Christ in the Constitution of the nation, these questions are duly concocted and safely placed in the archives of the church, to be brought out when the woman with the ballot appears.

Two Tender-Hearted and Brave Women.

From the Sun.

The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals numbers among its members Miss Eva Ingersoll, the daughter of Robert G. Ingersoll. From the window of her father's residence, 400 Fifth avenue, the other day she saw the driver of a garbage cart beating his horse over the head with a barrel hoop, which had a nail in it. The animal was old and lame, and his body was covered with sores. She ran out and entreated the man to desist, but he continued to thrash the horse. Thinking that if she showed him her membership certificate from the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals the driver would be scared, she ran into the house, brought the document out, and again insisted that he should stop beating the horse. The man, whose name was David Muhle, laughed in the young lady's face. Then Miss Ingersoll seized the horse's bridle, at the same time calling the attention of Mrs. Wallace, another member of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, to the situation. She promptly came to the brave girl's assistance, and the ladies stopped the wagon at Thirty-second street and Fifth avenue. Then Muhle began flogging the horse again, making him fairly drag the ladies along, and threatened to strike them if they did not let go the bridle.

For six blocks the driver swore at the horse and the women before a man was found gallant enough to assume the responsibility of stopping it. He was H. B. Gillingham, of 354 West Twenty-second street. Relieving the ladies of their task, he unharnessed the horse and paid a man to take him to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals stable in Twenty-second street. Muhle had escaped in the crowd that collected and had crossed the river to New Jersey, but it was learned that he was driving the garbage wagon for a man named Christian Altflox, of Weehawken. Young Gillingham went straight to Jefferson Market court and swore out the warrant upon which Muhle was arrested. Muhle was recognized by the officers of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals as a man they had arrested in January on Fifth avenue for beating an old gray horse. He was taken to Jefferson market court. No one offering bail, he was locked up for a week, and then taken to the special sessions court for trial before Justices Kilbraith, Smith, and Ford. Gillingham left a sick wife to giv his testimony, and Mrs. Thomas Lotos, living at the Murray Hill Hotel, who saw Muhle's brutal conduct, was ready as a witness, but the prisoner pleaded guilty and so got off with a fine of $10. The horse was shot by the society. Miss Ingersoll and Mrs. Wallace were not notified when the case came up for trial, and this week they called at the society's office, and expressed great satisfaction that the driver had been arrested and fined. Mrs. Wallace's name is among the first enrolled as members of the society, while Miss Ingersoll is known as one of its most enthusiastic supporters.

A Solution of the "Mormon Problem."

While the Freethinkers hav been holding a succession of successful meetings in Salt Lake City, an account of which we print elsewhere, the Christians of that city hav not been idle. An evangelical convention met there April 3d–5th, the object of which was to turn the Mormons from the Mormon church toward the Christian. But so far as we can judge from the reports, little progress was made in this direction. The audiences were not Mormons, but Christians, and one report goes on to say that no signs of any immediate apostacy from the Mormon church were apparent to the members of the convention. They did not see any ground for a hope that the people can be turned at once into the churches. Therefore, the churches must demand legislation to destroy Mormonism, and they indict the religion of Joe Smith in this way: "The Mormon idea of God is that he is 'a great big Mormon.' The Bible is perverted, and by 'continued revelations' its sacredness is destroyed. The priesthood hold absolute control, not only in religious matters, but in political and business affairs as well. Everyone who has encountered these obstacles recognizes them as real, and their magnitude cannot be overstated."

The church could not reach the Mormons at all, "only the apostate element," and as "these are mostly Infidels and Spiritualists" (so the report states), the outlook is not rose-colored for the evangelicals. But they liv in hope, and trust, among other things, to "the general interest of the country and of humanity in our work; the prayers of true souls everywhere; the pressure of outside civilization; the divine element in human nature; the natural operation of time and change; and lastly, the omnipresent spirit of God, the I Am which sent Moses on his mighty mission." The evangelicals do well to incorporate among their remedies for polygamy and adherence to a low superstition "the pressure of outside civilization," and "the operation of time and change." These two are Secular remedies, and the only ones of those proposed of any value at all. The Mormons already possess the rest of the list.

The Freethought meetings, on the other hand, not only were successful for more than three months, instead of three days, but if the Salt Lake papers may be believed they converted many Mormons. The audiences which listened to Dr. York, says the Salt Lake Tribune, were largely composed of Mormons. This was so when Mr. Putnam lectured there, laying the foundations for Dr. York's successful visit, and has continued through the fourteen weeks of the latter's teaching.. It is, we should judge, safe to say that not less than a thousand Mormons hav in the last year abandoned superstition for Rationalism, so far as they can comprehend the philosophy of science, and are lost to both the Christian and Mormon churches. And the Liberals hav not asked for restraining legislation, hav evinced no desire to persecute the saints because of their false doctrins, and hav not so much as mentioned the "I Am which sent Moses on his mighty mission." Judging, therefore, from results, and pursuing the inductiv method of philosophizing, the student of political and religious economy will award the laurel of merit to the Freethinkers. They, at least, hav accomplished something toward the civilization of Utah, hav taken some of the bond-slaves from the grasp of the priesthood, and if properly supported could probably revolutionize the theology of the territory within a decade. We respectfully suggest that the churches turn their missionary funds for the conversion of Mormon polygamists over to the American Secular Union to be used to pay the expenses of Liberal lecturers to travel through the territory and civilize the people.

Authority.

The pope has condemned the boycotting campaigns of the Irish Nationalists, and the Irish priests will be obliged to withdraw from the National League. The laymen are undecided whether they will obey his holiness or not, some of them claiming with Dr. McGlynn that the pope has no business with politics, while others are disposed to submit quietly.

But the point raised by the defiant agitators has been settled years ago, and again recently. The Catholic church claims supreme authority in questions of faith and morals. By including politics in "morals" the church maintains her right to direct her people's choice and policy in statecraft. The bishops hav interfered in elections, under this claim, in this country, in Spain, in France, in Germany, in Italy, and elsewhere. The rule is well established, and though the pope has not in recent years officially proclaimed it, his agents hav acted on it without censure. The Irish Nationalists who refuse to obey the pope will find themselvs subject to disciplin.

This question of obeying or not obeying is the paramount issue with the Irishmen at present. All sorts of advice is given: one leader says obey; another says, tell the pope to keep out of politics. The see-saw of defiant and submissiv oratory bids fair to go on indefinitly. The latest weighty opinion given is that of Mr. Parnell, a Protestant. He opposes the pope, but advises the people to submit in all matters of faith and morals, while at the same time insisting on the claim that politically Irish opinion and judgment must be supreme.

To a Freethinker this dispute seems absurd and incomprehensible. Why should one man obey another in political or religious matters? Why should the people of Ireland or America or any other country put their minds in the keeping of any man? Who made the pope the "boss" of anybody? A self-respecting man will tweak the nasal organ of anyone, pope or politician, who sticks that organ into the self-respecting man's business. Why don't the Irishmen ask Mr. Pecci to attend to his own affairs, and let Ireland alone?

This "authority business" is a great deal overdone. It used to be worse, perhaps, but there is too much of it even now. There is a certain class of people, and it is a large one, and not confined exclusivly to the churches, who think their mission in life is to boss somebody, to say what other people shall do or think, in short, to attend to other people's business. No matter how unsuccessful, illogical, stupid, and incapable one of this class may be in his own life, he thinks that he can guide his neighbor's life better than the neighbor can himself. So he wants a law to regulate that neighbor—to say when he shall rest, when he shall go to church, what he shall drink, when he shall listen to music or go to a theater, and when and how he shall do or not do a thousand and one things. The impudence of his claim seems never to occur to him. He assumes to the world the relation of a parent to a child, and calmly makes rules governing the child's conduct. His authority is self-assumed in many instances, but usually he falls back upon divine law, as interpreted by himself, as his support. The worst and most arrogant of these authority fiends is the Catholic church; the Protestant organization is not far behind, and in some places, indeed, is a little ahead; while following on are many who hav somehow rejected church beliefs but not church methods. They cling to their self-appointed mission of bossing other folks, and grieve much that the other folks sometimes object.

All of these wearers of the self-woven garments of authority need to study the doctrin taught in the Declaration of Independence, that all men are born free and equal and endowed with the inalienable right to own their own brains, and vote as they please. Liberty is the greatest of all things, and the one supreme thing worth fighting for. The pope will never understand this until all his subjects rebel. The Protestant clergy will never understand it till they are left without support. And we are sorry to say a good many Infidels will not comprehend it until they learn to reason logically. The constant struggle of the world has been for liberty. Gaining liberty, it has gained all it has of civilization. Without liberty to think and investigate the world would still be in barbarism. Yet to-day we find a nation struggling for political freedom wondering whether or not it shall obey a pope, a pope who is only a man, without a shred of authority more than the meanest and dirtiest human being in the world! It is astonishing how men do like to be chained.

Religion and Real Estate.

The ministers of St. Paul, Minn., recently held a meeting to consider what they should do about getting up a revival. Munhall, the revivalist, was there, and being desirous of a job, he favored the scheme. The St. Paul Globe reports him as saying:

"The town needs such a movement as this more than anything else. It'll boom the town so that you'll go ahead of Minneapolis so far that the people of that place can't see you. A great movement such as this promises to be will be better for you than twenty blast furnaces and a dozen railroads."

This used to be Sam Jones's favorit argument in favor of revivals, and the instigators of those at which he performed obtained subscriptions from the tradesmen of the town solely for business reasons. A revival with Sam Jones or Sam Small on the platform ranks with Barnum's circus as an attraction to draw to town the inhabitants of the surrounding country. The circus, however, imparts a little more hilarity to the occasion, and the people spend money a little more liberally than when driving in to attend a revival. Mr. Munhall is a quick absorber of business facts.

But we hav searched the four gospels in vain for any authority for this use of religion. On a few occasions Jesus gathered great multitudes to whom he advanced revolutionary religious ideas, but we find nowhere in his directions to his advance agents, or apostles, as they were called, any suggestion that his coming was to be used as a means of booming real estate. In his sermons there are no indirect allusions to the rise in the price of corner lots in Jerusalem as a result of his advent. But if Munhall had preached the Sermon on the Mount he would first hav staked the ground off, and sold it at auction after the services. Neither in the importunity of the Macedonians for a revivalist do we find any mention of the benefit St. Paul would confer upon the country by attracting immigration. It is doubtful if the committee of invitation thought of the matter from that standpoint. So far as we can learn from the New Testament—which we admit is but an imperfect record—the inventors of the Christian religion were honest but deluded folks, like the investers in Keely motor stock or the makers of perpetual motion machines, who preached their doctrins with no thought of gain to themselvs or town. They had no boards of trade to boom their cities.

The preachers and revivalists of to-day, however, are progressiv men, with progressiv notions, and are not circumscribed and limited by the conventionalities which the son of God and the apostles were bound to observe. Hence their greater success in making converts, and consequently greater emoluments. Christians in the days of Jesus were scarce; now there are hordes of them. Jesus preached for nothing, and picked his neighbors' corn for lunch. The apostles went out with no scrip in their purses, and had hard times to get enough to eat. The revivalists of to-day liv at the best hotels, get about a thousand dollars a week, and are content with nothing of their neighbors' less valuable than their wives. Truly, Christianity has progressed since the apostolic age.

The Indians and the Churches.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 28th, in speaking of the order of the Interior Department that hereafter the language used in teaching the aborigines shall be exclusivly English, we said:

"This has aroused the ire of the churches engaged in evangelizing the red men at the expense of the country, as it renders useless the religious works translated into the various Indian languages, and several religious bodies and conferences hav remonstrated with President Cleveland concerning the order, but to no effect."

This was written upon the authority of a religious journal, and as usually befalls humanity when depending upon Christian statements, we were led astray. Since writing it we hav received from the Department of the Interior a pamphlet containing the correspondence on "the subject of teaching the vernacular in Indian schools," and the president's letter in reply to a resolution adopted at a session of the Philadelphia annual conference of the Methodist church. The department's order is:

"1. No text-book in the vernacular will be allowed in any school where children are placed under contract, or where the government contributes, in any manner whatever, to the support of the school; no oral instruction in the vernacular will be allowed at such schools. The entire curriculum must be in the English language.

"2. The vernacular may be used in missionary schools, only for oral instruction in morals and religion, where it is deemed to be an auxiliary to the English language in conveying such instruction; and only nativ Indian teachers will be permitted to otherwise teach in any Indian vernacular; and these nativ teachers will only be allowed so to teach in schools not supported in whole or in part by the government, and at remote points, where there are no government or contract schools where the English language is taught. These nativ teachers are only allowed to teach in the vernacular, with a view of reaching those Indians who cannot hav the advantages of instruction in English, and such instruction must giv way to the English-teaching schools as soon as they are established where the Indians can hav access to them.

"3. A limited theological class of Indian young men may be trained in the vernacular at any purely missionary school, supported exclusivly by missionary societies, the object being to prepare them for the ministry, whose subsequent work shall be confined to preaching, unless they are employed as teachers in remote settlements, where English schools are inaccessible.

"4. These rules are not intended to prevent the possession or use by any Indian of the Bible published in the vernacular, but such possession or use shall not interfere with the teaching of the English language to the extent and in the manner hereinbefore directed."

It appears from this order and from Mr. Cleveland's letter, in which he tacitly recommends the reading of a "chapter in the Bible in English, or in Dakota if English could not be understood, at the daily opening of these schools," that the ministers cried out before they were hurt. The churches are to be allowed to maintain mission schools in which to train Indian preachers; they may giv or sell to the Indians Bibles in any vernacular of any tribe; they may prevail upon the teachers of government schools to read the Bible to the Indian youth upon every school-day, and they may teach adult Indians any superstition in any vernacular they choose to use. If the churches desire more than this, they are excessivly greedy. Both the Indian commissioner and the president are nauseatingly complaisant toward the Bible Society, and seem to desire nothing in the world so much as to suit the church organizations.

Mr. Hamilton's Career to Date.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will doubtless recollect that when S. P. Putnam lectured in Ukiah, Cal., last spring he was attacked by two ministers and a man named Hamilton, a city official, lawyer, and college graduate. Mr. Hamilton was so zealous in the cause of Christ that he flung a lighted lamp at Mr. Putnam's head, which passed by and crashed through the window. With shouts of "Damn him, kill him!" Mr. Hamilton seized another, but was taken from the hall before he could throw it. Afterward, he was indicted for murderous assault, but through the sympathy of a Christian court escaped further punishment than the payment of one hundred dollars fine.

Mr. Hamilton has again come before the public, as we learn from the San Francisco Freethought. Last fall the citizens of Ukiah got up a scheme to purchase the right of way for a railroad from their town to North Cloverdale, and Hamilton was made secretary of the organization formed to raise money for the purchase. He accepted the position and collected money with assiduous avidity. A month ago he was called on to report progress, but his callers found that just previous to their calling he had been called to San Francisco. The sheriff of Mendocino county was appointed a committee of one to make a further call on Mr. Hamilton at his hotel in 'Frisco to inquire why he thus held himself aloof from his Ukiah neighbors. Upon reaching the city the sheriff found that the secretary's affairs had taken him to Australia, and that he had inadvertently carried the funds of the Ukiah and North Cloverdale Railway Extension Company with him. Effort will be made to induce him to return. Ukiah people, says Freethought, do not care so much for the loss of the few thousand dollars Hamilton got away with, but they object to losing from among them a man who can arise to the necessities of all occasions and be a burning and a shining light to all the place.

When Mr. Hamilton returns to his own (in care of the proper officer) it will giv THE TRUTH SEEKER great pleasure to chronicle his further efforts to stay the tide of Infidelity now sweeping over California.

Mr. Bradlaugh Loses a Suit.

Shortly after the Trafalgar square riot in London, wherein the unemployed workmen who were making known their grievances were outrageously abused by the police, Mr. Bradlaugh rose in Parliament and charged Mr. Salisbury with having given his check to a Mr. Peters to be used to promote workingmen's meetings and stir them up to riotous demonstrations in order that the government might hav a pretext for taking arbitrary measures to suppress them.

Mr. Peters sued Mr. Bradlaugh for libel, laying damages at five hundred pounds. The suit was tried on the 18th ult. Mr. Salisbury was called as a witness, and admitted that in December, 1883, his secretary forwarded to Mr. Kelly, secretary of the Dock Laborers' Association, a check for £25. The purpose for which it was intended was ~~to~~ provide a free breakfast for the starving poor. He denied that he gave any checks to promote the workingmen's meetings held previously to the riots in Trafalgar square. He also denied that he signed a check in favor of Mr. Peters in connection with any Trafalgar square meetings. Mr. Peters testified that he had never received any money from Lord Salisbury. A coffee house keeper showed that a check for £25 had been given him to provide dinners for unemployed workingmen. Mr. Kelly, the coffee house keeper, testified that he disbursed the money given by Lord Salisbury for charity. He had not used any of it for political purposes.

Mr. Bradlaugh expressed regret that he had charged Lord Salisbury with giving the check to promote the Trafalgar square meetings. He urged that, as other checks had been so applied, his statement was not libelous. A verdict was returned awarding the plaintiff £300 damages. Mr. Bradlaugh's party members in Parliament hav raised the amount by subscription.

This is almost the first important suit in his reform work that Mr. Bradlaugh has lost, and he seems to be more technically than morally at fault even in this. There is no doubt that money has been used by the Tories to excite the rebellious tendency of the unemployed, so that the government would be justified not only in doing nothing for them but in using the police and troops to suppress them. Mr. Bradlaugh picked out the wrong check to follow, and found Salisbury shrewder in covering his tracks than the Northampton member supposed. Politics is a great game and requires much skill when played successfully.

Editorial Notes.

THE Woman Suffrage Association of Washington on the evening of the 3d instant passed this resolution: "Resolved, That it is the duty of every woman in the Methodist denomination to withdraw from any church where the pastor upholds the action of the General Conference, now assembled in New York city, in refusing to receive the noble women sent there as lay delegates."

THE Congregational ministers of Chicago, as by this time pretty much all the world knows, hav on hand a boom labeled, "Sabbath Preservation." Twenty-five of them constitute a committee to call on the managers of the different railroads to protest against running trains on Sunday. It has been noticed that these Sabbath Protestants do not hesitate to ride to church on a street-car on Sunday, if they hav any distance to go, and this fact, the secular newspapers think, may rob their protest of a good share of its force.

IN Germany the stupid peasantry are Catholics. The government officials are Protestants. The educated and middle classes are Infidels. A physician who goes to church conceals the fact because the people look with suspicion upon those who should be "naturalists" par excellence, yet exhibit leanings toward superstition, as religion is regarded by most of the Germans. The Protestant church is the state church, but its communicants are mostly officials and society folks who attend as a duty in the morning, and go to a concert or theater to enjoy themselvs in the afternoon and evening. There is a vast difference in the depth of piety in a German and in a Puritan.

THE religious journals complain that the evangelization of large cities is made difficult "by the great number of ignorant foreigners who flock to our cities, many of whom are not only irreligious, but activly hostil to Christianity." This is not true. The most ignorant and degraded foreigners who come here are, almost without exception, Roman Catholics, and while it may be difficult to "evangelize" these, they certainly are already Christianized. What they most need is to be civilized.

As a rule, says the Tribune, religious papers do not venture to discuss the merits of Spiritualism, possibly because many of their readers are disposed to acknowledge some of its claims. This is true, and why not? If angels—which are mortals who hav put on immortality—exist, why may not they come back to earth? The Catholic church holds that they can, but that only the bad ones do. But if bad ones can and do revisit their haunts, why cannot good ones do so also? In the divine economy of eternity is evil more powerful than good? If so, what is the use of being good? The Badger Boy's Sunday-school teacher will please stand up and reply.

BY an almost unanimous vote Dr. Edward B. Foote, Jr., was elected president of the Manhattan Liberal Club on Friday night, the 27th ult., in place of Van Buren Denslow, who finds it impossible to regularly attend to the duties of the office. Dr. Foote has presided at the larger number of the meetings during the last year, and his promotion is in the line of true civil service reform. He has also devoted much time to the interests of the Club and secured exceptional talent for its platform. The program for the remainder of this month is as follows: May 11th, Charles F. Wingate; May 18th, Helen Gardener; May 25th, Courtlandt Palmer. Every one of these speakers is sure to be interesting. The other officers of the Club are the same as last year, with the exception of Augustus Leavy, added to the list of vice-presidents. Van Buren Denslow and A. L. Rawson were elected honorary members.

COLONEL INGERSOLL received the following dispatch from the New York legislature last week: "You are the unanimous choice of the legislativ committee to deliver the memorial address in the assembly chamber in honor of the late Roscoe Conkling. The legislature will adjourn on May 11th. It is desired to hold the exercises prior to that date. Will you please designate some evening that will best accommodate you for that purpose?" The New York World says: "The selection of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll as orator on the occasion of the Conkling memorial exercises at Albany, under the auspices of the legislature, is a most wise one. Colonel Ingersoll knew Mr. Conkling intimately and he was his steadfast friend. His eloquence, his sincerity and his love of truth, eminently qualify him for the role of eulogist on this occasion." Mr. Conkling was an Agnostic; though a quiet one, he never hesitated to avow his opinion when the occasion seemed to him to demand its expression. The religious journals, we note, fail to state this fact in their notice of his death.

MR. D. H. DAVIS, of Almonte, Ont., has won laurels in oratory in defending the rights of the Freethinkers of the place to the use of the town hall, which had been refused them for a lecture by Charles Watts. A local paper says:

"Mr. D. H. Davis, on behalf of the Secularists of Almonte, appeared before the council board to ascertain whether the hall might be obtained for the purpose of Secular lectures, and the eloquence which he poured forth in his appeal to the lovers of 'freedom of speech and the intellectual liberty of every citizen of Almonte,' as he styled it, must hav awakened in the minds of his hearers the fact that among Secularists, as well as other people, there are men of eloquence, who possess hearts that throb to every sympathy of human nature, and whose intellects, though, in our humble opinion, misdirected, are more or less burnished by the learning and advancement of the nineteenth century. Were Mr. Davis to make such efforts in the cause of Christianity, he would inscribe his name on the local tablet of fame, and it would go down to posterity, not, as the poet sings, 'unwept, unhonored, and unsung,' but as that of a man whose life was worthy of example."

The correspondent who sends this to Secular Thought quotes the ideas and phraseology of Mr. Davis's speech, and we are not at all astonished that he amazed the unread Christians of the place. His speech was lifted bodily from Colonel Ingersoll's defense of C. B. Reynolds, substituting Almonte for New Jersey.

MR. F. W. BRADLEY, a good friend, of San Diego, Cal., sends us the statement, taken from the Catholic Monitor, of "J. McPlarick, acting-sergeant," and "Michael Hession, constable," both presumably of the police force of Knock, Ireland, concerning the cure of "Mrs. Murray, parish of Dunmore, county of Galway," of paralysis, by a visit to the Knock chapel on the night of August 14, 1887, and asks us to notice it in the paper, as he regards it as a "stunner." We should like, for Mr. Bradley's benefit, to make a visit to Ireland and expose the humbuggery of the Knock chapel, but hav at present other and more urgent duties. But we find consolation in the thought that it can be scarcely necessary to kill the dead. Every one of these "miracles," when followed up, proves to be but lying or trickery on the part of the priests and their ignorant dupes like this acting-sergeant and constable. The miserable imposture at Knock has been often exposed. The accounts of miraculous cures there, like the faith cures here, are pure fabrication. And if Mr. Bradley had stopped and pondered a moment over the extract from the Monitor sent us, he would hav seen something that might hav bothered the Catholic gentleman to whom he admitted that the cure was a stunner. The letter inclosing the statement of the acting-sergeant and constable also conveyed the news that the archdeacon who celebrates mass in the chapel and has charge of the premises and the mysterious light was slowly dying, hopelessly stricken by disease. Why was he not taken to the chapel and cured?

Letters from Friends.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME,
DAYTON, OHIO, March 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Heston's cartoons are excellent, and, I am certain, add very much to the force of the paper, and much enhance its effect in enlightening the benighted and priest-ridden.

An old newspaper man myself, I assure you that you conduct your journal so well that I do not see how it could be improved. The editorials especially are super-excellent; they are in point of force beyond anything I hav seen elsewhere in Freethought papers during the twenty years that I hav critically read them. Your paper is the peer of any I hav seen, English, Australian, or American.

Your friend, WM. H. MCRAE.

KANAWHA FALLS, W. VA., April 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: This is "April Fools'" and the Lord's day—synonymous terms—a coincidence, you see. I will fool you by sending herewith my check for $4, to apply on my subscription and as otherwise designated. Our village can boast of several outspoken Liberals, and has gained a county reputation of being "a black Infidel hole." We keep them stirred up through the county papers whenever an opportunity presents. Some time since an attack was made on the Secular Union and our Nine Demands in the Star (Charlestown). A friend of mine took up the cudgel, and orthodoxy has not had such a raking for a long time. It got so hot for them that the editor said he could "print no more flagrant attacks on the Bible." Yours hastily, W. H. TYREE.

DELAVAN, MINN., March 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I supposed when I came to this place I would stand alone, as at several other places where I hav been, but, lo and behold, I find Brother Jamieson has served the Lord here, and there is a good sprinkling of the right kind of thinkers as a showing. One of our Liberal friends dropped in and had a chat with me a few days ago. He tells me that one of the faithful was heard to say: "Well, I don't like the style of the new agent. He is one of those Ingersoll fellows, and we are getting too many of them." You see I was not at all backward in letting them know how I stood, and I must say I am more than pleased to find so many Liberals here, and I trust and hope we will hav many pleasant chats together, and perhaps do some good for the cause. Yours, etc., W. L. HORTON.

LEADVILLE, COL., April 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER since March, 1887. I subscribed for it with Mr. and Mrs. Akers, two stanch and outspoken Liberals. Although we are young converts, we hav taken a bold stand for the promotion of the glorious cause of universal mental liberty. We receive our papers Tuesdays of each week. I can scarcely wait from one week to the next to get my paper. I think it one of the grandest papers ever read by man—a paper that can not be excelled for comfort, truth, fairness, and honor.

Why is it some of our Liberal lecturers do not visit Leadville? They certainly could do a great work here. I believe that Leadville can produce more Liberals than any other town in Colorado. All they want is a few Liberal lectures to arouse that spirit in them which is essential to make good Freethinkers. Yours truly, D. A. COLLINS.

LAKE MILLS, IA., April 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: How grand, I might say sacred, the words "truth seeker" are to me! My greatest desire is that all mankind were seekers of truth. Superstition of the past ages and the present age is, as it were, a great wall for truth to overthrow, but truth is mighty and will prevail. There is in this little town of five hundred inhabitants quite an underground Liberal feeling that is growing stronger from day to day. I am about the only one that dares to defend the truth as a Freethinker, openly and boldly. If I am called an Infidel it only givs me more strength. All Freethinkers should feel proud of their name, for it means a lover of truth and a despiser of superstition. A truth seeker will not teach that three are one. Those communications that are published from week to week are to me a great source of encouragement. It is like an old-fashioned Methodist conference to read of so many that are seekers after the truth; it givs us strength and courage to still continue in the good cause. S. D. WADSWORTH.

EAU CLAIRE, April 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Ritchey, of Fossil—a well-named place—has been misinformed by the "grand and noble old man" who converted her to orthodoxy. Water is not the only substance which expands at its freezing-point, or rather in passing from the liquid to the solid state; for though ice is lighter than ice-cold water, ice-cold water is not lighter than other water, but heavier, as Mrs. Ritchey may immediately prove by pouring some into a kettle of warm water, and testing the top and bottom of the fluid with two thermometers. Bismuth expands in solidifying, and liquid bismuth contains no fish to be preserved by the solid substance becoming lighter. India-rubber contracts with heat and expands with cold, and so do organic solids generally. Let Mrs. Ritchey fry a lean beafsteak in a "spider," and she will find that it contracts materially. Again, it is not true that variations no longer occur. They occur in every individual of every species. Ernst Haeckel has shown that every "good" or true species originates in a "bad" species, that is, a confused assemblage of individuals varying in all directions from that type to which the evolution of the species approximates their descendants. I hav not read the lecture of Huxley's to which Mrs. Ritchey refers, but I suspect the passage she quotes of suffering by isolation. No one doubts that forms of animal and vegetable life may remain almost unchanged for an indefinit period under the same conditions. It is altered conditions, induced principally by the multiplication of a species, and its extension to other climates and other necessities, which secure, by the law of natural selection, the perpetuation of variations favorable to continued existence after the change. C. L. JAMES.

BRONSTON, KY., March 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It does appear to me that the great question to be settled with the intellectual, scientific, and religious world is: Is there a personal God who can and does hear our prayers, and will answer or not according to his own will? In 1 Kings xviii, this very question seems to hav been fairly and squarely settled in the affirmativ. Elijah had King Ahab call all Israel and the prophets of Baal to Mount Carmel, and there, before King Ahab and the whole Israelitish nation, proved beyond the possibility of a doubt that God did answer prayer. A man at this day may be excused if he doubts that the events recorded in 1 Kings xviii ever occurred. I, as an humble citizen of Kentucky, claiming to be honest, call upon Rev. T. Dewitt Talmage, or any other priest of the living God, to giv us as fair a test of this question as Elijah did to all Israel on Mount Carmel. God is unchangeable, and willing that all men may come to a knowledge of the truth.

Inclosed find twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL for 1888.

I. N. BROWN.

MIDDLEBURG, IND., March 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find money for "History of Christianity," by Edward Gibbon. I hav just finished Ingergoll's Defense of Reynolds, and think it one of his greatest productions. It is astonishing how any jury could resist such truths. I long to see the day when Ingersoll's Lectures will be in every home in this world. They should be found on every teacher's desk, and in every public library. The world is tending toward this with great rapidity, but there is much yet to do, much ignorance and superstition yet to overcome. We need ten thousand more Ingersolls. I hav, however, seen a great change for the better in the last half of a century.

Freethinkers are numerous. We find twenty now where years ago we could not find one. This is very encouraging to all who are interested in the welfare and advancement of the human race. In my opinion THE TRUTH SEEKER is the greatest aid toward perfection the world has ever seen, and R. G. Ingersoll the true savior of men. Christ, no doubt, helped to improve the world, but he was full of imperfections. But I must close, expressing the wish that you keep the great Heston at the head of the art department.

Fraternally, ISAAC IVINS.

OLATHE, KAN., April 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Absolute Prohibition and strict Sunday laws are a little hard on the wayward Kansan, who has been in the habit of doing as he pleases. I don't object to Prohibition, but when it comes to shutting up ice-cream and lemonade places on the only day of the week that working people can patronize them, I think it a little too pious. It has been so in this city for almost a year that one could not get ice-cream, lemonade, cigars, or tobacco on Sunday. Nothing is to be had but gospel; there is an abundance of that.

In the late city election the church was a little divided. There was no politics to speak of, so it was a good time for the church. One faction supported the present administration, while the other wanted a change. All was quiet till election day came, when the ladies of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union went around circulating reports to the effect that all in favor of the change belonged to the whisky ring, and didn't believe in God, hell, or the devil. There was no truth in the report, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union knew it, but they were after their point, and they got it. C. B. Reynolds did lots of good when he was here last winter. Any one of his three lectures was worth the price we paid him for all. He left a good impression on the people, and if he ever comes again he will hav twice as many to hear him as he had then. I heard a man say the other day that he would as lief hear Reynolds as Ingersoll. He had heard them both. N. M. DEWEES.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., April 8, 288.

MR. EDITOR: It is not my intention to occupy your valuable space in discussion to any length, but I wish to defend my argument for the comprehending powers of finite man against my friend Hammond's attack upon them. He thinks I confound conception with comprehension. Not at all, for I claim that man cannot only conceive, but understand, limitlessness or infinity. He says himself that "we cannot understand or even conceive a beginning or an end to consciousness." Then he does understand and conceive the infinity or limitlessness of consciousness, doesn't he? But how absurd his application, when we all experience a beginning and an end to consciousness every time we go to sleep and wake up! Hence consciousness is not, as he says, infinit, and is not to be classed with time and space. Those who contend that the finite cannot comprehend the infinit want an excuse for believing or teaching other people that which they can not explain and which does not in reality exist.

I hav not said that we hav an infinit faculty of comprehension. But I do say that as there is no limit to the distance the light of a finite candle will travel, so there is no limit to the comprehending power of the mind. I will admit that there may be some people so weak-minded that they cannot comprehend infinity, but they should not conclude that others are equally helpless with themselvs.

If a perfect thing is not limited, has no limits, what does it hav? Perhaps he can tell how the infinit—that is, the shapeless, boundless, endless, limitless, and indefinit—can be perfect. I confess I cannot.

Infinity is purely a human conception. There are no other beings that hav revealed its existence to us. Man has discovered the infinit; can he, then, not comprehend his own discovery? He sees that certain things are limitless, and he exclaims, "Infinity!" Perfection is something definit; infinity is indefinit. Why believe that "the evolutionary laws are constantly advancing the universe toward a more perfect state of existence" if there is no God, no designer or controler, who is intelligent and beneficent? Was there ever a beginning? If everything ever done was done by the laws of nature, why was not everything always as perfect as at present? C. L. HASKELL.

CHILLICOTHE, MO., April 23, E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: We hav invented a machine, an apparatus—patent applied for—by which air and water are condensed, canned, and bottled—somewhat after the modus operandi of Yahveh's vialing up his most merciful wrath for greater convenience in pouring out upon the heads of ungodly sinners (Rev. xvi, 1). We propose canvassing this entire continent, and disposing of county and state rights to pious land-grabbers, who hold land at such exorbitant prices that it is next to one of the impossibilities for the poor white trash—of which we are a member in good standing—to procure so much dirt as to make a home upon. Now, this aforesaid invention is what these godly dirt-sharks hav been praying for for many long centuries, who are enjoined by their great teacher, Christ, to "Lay not up for yourselvs treasures upon earth" (Matt. vi, 19). We sincerely hope, however, that these greedy would-be monopolizers of air and water will not be so bereft of humanity as to allow themselvs to exact of infants and old age, the maimed and blind, the deaf and dumb, full rates for these necessary commodities of life, should I, God'lmighty, or anyone else convey to them that right.

Be that as it may, however, we will sweeten this epistle by inclosing $2.50, for which please send me "The Secret of the East," by Felix L. Oswald, and "God and His Book," by Saladin. And, if you hav Prof. R. A. Proctor's astronomical works, you can send them to us, with the cost thereof, and we will remit on receipt of the same. L. CHUTE.

ADRIAN, MICH., April 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In the Ironclad Age, March 31st, appears a very elaborate article from the pen of the gifted Grace Greenough, entitled, "The Sixteenth Amendment." I am a vindicator of noble woman. Her sphere is plainly defined, and when she steps aside from her world she takes the initiativ toward her decline. Woman's influence sways either to good or to evil. Many true, loyal-hearted women would ultimately see the fallacy of their aspirations in the direction that a few cranks seek to lead them. Remember, I am not holding up man as a model of justness and purity. Far from it; but he does not like to hav his idol dashed or contaminated. He will sacrifice all, even honor, to the shrine of woman, and you, "O woman!" ought to be satisfied with the situation. You can make your home a desirable abode, or otherwise; it remains with you, fair divinities. If the head of the concern will not behave, you hav your remedy and should enforce it.

Once get power and then, O ye frail woman, with all your privileges you would not know what to do with them, you who cannot throw a stone, except by a motion over your shoulder, and then the missil would not hit a barn though aimed directly at it. What would you do with the vast power vested in you as directors of the mundane world? To dabble in politics will abridge your divine influence toward your co-existing necessity, man. Occupy your sphere with angel-like demeanor. Be good to yourselvs, and try to endure the association of finite man. Woman is a jewel that must not be spoiled in its setting. O. S. BARRETT.

NEW YORK, N. Y., March 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In your last issue I noticed an article written by Mr. Paul Gariepy. This article has startled my reticence, and precipitated an expression from me—one of approbation and of substantiation. I approve of Mr. Gariepy's appeal on strictly moral grounds, as a matter of justice, and as a secondary matter of expediency. I substantiate his article very firmly by declaring that "Progress and Poverty" led me along a silent, but cheerful, highway, and I hav discovered that I am traveling with progress. Are you going to shut the door against me and also the hundreds of thousands that are still lingering on this highway? Is your policy one that courts the "line of greatest resistance" or one that rejects it and adopts the line of least resistance as its direction for intellectual combat? Those people who do not see the relation that political reform bears to religious reform are, to say the least of them, exceedingly narrow-minded, and are people of very shallow perceptions, whether Freethinkers or Roman Catholics by name. If you cannot get men to question the validity of political institutions without ignorance and immovable prejudice, how hard is it, then, to expect men to even dare to question the origin, aim, or ends of an institution whose ship is the ship of ignorance and whose waters are the seas of prejudice?

Therefore, I say, accord this man Mr. Henry George at least justice, something a Liberal cannot deny with consistency. The drift of thought at present is toward investigation of political matters, and this implies religious matters. Religion and politics always maintain a common equilibrium, and progress of the one means the corresponding action of the other; therefore encourage and do not dismay a reformer of any kind. I also will mention the fact that the reform so nobly advocated by Mr. George, if adopted, will deprive the church of fully fifty per cent of its despotic power. That the church acts in all possible manners as his silent but aggressiv enemy, and places itself in his path as an obstruction, is very evident. The church can readily define Georgeism, as it is a synonym for progress, and it appreciates the fact. Do not let us weigh the religious conceptions of a man, but let us try and comprehend the immense amount of thought involved in his philosophy.

I am highly pleased with the FREETHINKERS' ALMANAO.

Yours truly, AUGUST PETRY.

LEAD CITY, DAK., March 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Being here a lonely Freethinker in a community of church people, I feel it my duty to write a few words concerning this place and its people. Lead City is a mining town in the Black Hills that has grown up in the last nine or ten years, and has now a population of sixteen hundred, with three churches and the fourth to be built. So you see the orthodox element is strong here, and rules the town; but, however strong, it is not without some Liberals. There are a few Liberals here, and many more doubters, with whom I am acquainted. I hav had many a discussion with the Christians on religious subjects, and they generally get the worst of it. I hav also scattered some tracts and copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER among them, which I never saw any more of. It is hard and discouraging work for an Infidel to work for the cause of Liberalism in a Christian community like this.

What is needed here is a lecturer to deliver a course of lectures. A splendid hall here, newly built, called the Odd Fellows' Hall, could be hired at a reasonable price, and if either Mr. Remsburg or some other noted Freethinker would come and lecture a few evenings it would do much good. So far as I know, I am the only one that receives THE TRUTH SEEKER from this post-office. I hav been trying to induce some others to take it, but so far without success.

When we consider the great absurdity of this infamy called the Christian religion, its self-contradictions and irreconcilability with all science, justice, nature, and common sense, especially its stories of the fall of man, the atonement, hell and damnation, and the rest, it strikes me as a wonder that civilized people could so long hav been held in mental bondage by it.

E. PEDERSEN.

STANLEY, IA., Feb. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send money order for which you will send THE TRUTH SEEKER for a new subscriber, and also my own paper. I got the books that were sent all right. I hav read the lecture of John E. Burton on "The Birth and Death of Religions," and must say that it is one of the best lectures I hav ever read. It will do to go along with Ingersoll's. I would recommend every Liberal in the land to send to THE TRUTH SEEKER office and get a copy and read it, and then giv to his neighbor to read, for I think it one of the best books to open the eyes of some of our straightbacks.

I see that the authorities of your city hav arrested some sixty of the members of the Grand Army for marching in your streets on Sunday while going to bury one of their dead comrades that fought to save his country, but had it been a Salvation Army, they might not only march, but could hoot the whole length of Broadway. Anything only so it is for God's sake. But let them pile it on; it is said that it was the last straw that broke the camel's back, and at the rate they are going it won't take long to break the back of almost anything. The same parties that caused that arrest were willing that the army should march on Sunday and fight on Sunday to save our country, and they or their God never said a word, but when they got back and one of their comrades happened to die, then marching became very offensiv to them and their God.

WM. REDFIELD.

SANTA ANA, CAL., April 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: C. B. Reynolds has visited our charming valley, but he came unto his own and his own received him not. Through some misunderstanding, no arrangements had been made for his lectures. When he arrived the best hall was engaged, and there was little time to notify the people. But the few who were so fortunate as to hear this noble, generous, self-sacrificing worker, this eloquent orator and genial man, enjoyed an inestimable treat. I fully agree with the editor of our Standard that I "could hav eagerly listened till midnight to the well-dressed words of truth that fell from his lips." Mr. Reynolds should hav a hearty support wherever he goes. He is a gentleman and a scholar. He delivers his ideas in such a manner as to compel the attention and respect of his hearers.

I was very pleasantly disappointed in him. From some of his modes of expression through THE TRUTH SEEKER, I had concluded that he was a sort of intellectual slugger or prize-fighter, but after having him in my family for four days I would call him the Gentle Reynolds. To be sure, he strikes heavy blows when on the rostrum against superstition and hypocrisy, but at the same time he is kind, gentle, forbearing, and highly charitable. For instance, he will say a certain person is a "measley thief," and immediately add, "But he can't help it; it was bred, and born, and educated into him." And those of us who may question some of his methods should extend to him the same charity he givs to others; and that we would like to hav given to us under similar circumstances.

D. EDSON SMITH.

METAMORA, O., April 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I will giv you my history and my experience in my time. I was born in 1809, in Pennsylvania, Lehigh county. I was brought up under the teaching of the church until I was eighteen years old; then I was taken in the church as a good church-member, and before I was of age I was made deacon and trustee in the church, and held close for some twenty years. I think the members and priest held me dearer than I did them, for I meant to be honest with myself and do as I would hav others do unto me, for that, I understood, was Christ-like, but I saw that church and members and preachers were to the contrary. They were, an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, and I was satisfied that if that was religion, such religion was not Christ-like, but was more adapted to that church devil that they talk of. So I no longer consider myself to belong to that orthodox church, where there is no room for an outsider. And I thank that great Father that I am an outsider, for I hav no faith in an orthodox God or heaven. But I am a full believer in a universal heaven and God, for I know that all creation came from the same creator, and holds all power only as he willeth. For we know that we are limited; I know that all the world is controled by law, and I cannot see how there can be a law without a lawgiver. So I am fully a believer in what we call god—not the name, but in the principle of the name, and that is, the spirit, the great all-in-all.

And we well know that a principle is eternal, yesterday and to-day and forever the same; so you may know that I fully believe that I shall always liv and progress—by natural law and not by the church law that leads to destruction, and misery, and pain. But I rejoice to know that we hav a law of progression that will lead us to love, harmony, peace, and good-will; and I am well satisfied that we will find what we will call heaven, where we will become brothers and sisters, and dwell in the angel sphere where all is beatitude.

PETER HOLBEN.

ORION, ILL., April 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I send you money for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the ANNUAL. I will not be without the best paper in America to expose frauds and the shams of Christianity and the rotten practices of many of its priests. Mr. Editor, I am rather surprised that there are men calling themselvs Liberals stopping their papers because you had the manhood to enter a protest against the injustice done to the seven men in Chicago. They were not sentenced according to law and evidence, but according to public opinion manufactured by the monopoly press of Chicago. The most dangerous Anarchy in this country is the Anarchy of the monopolists who with their money influence are corrupting our courts of justice, our legislators, state and national; buying votes; stuffing the ballot-box; buying the press to mislead the people to vote their every right away; setting at defiance law, right, and justice. But these Liberals that are stopping their papers because you advocated justice for these men hav no protest to enter against the Anarchy of monopolists, who are ruining our once glorious country, making it more of a diluted monarchy than a free republic, with all of its worst features and few of its best. One of your correspondents, O. S. Barrett, says, "Anarchy: synonym, confusion." This definition was given by Mr. Webster at a time when all laws were made by the aristocracy and kings, and the people were made subjects and slaves by law. Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, Paine, and others were considered Anarchists and conspirators by the ruling power of Great Britain. The slaves held in the Southern states were made such by law. Anarchy is not nearly as bad as pictured by Mr. Barrett. He says it is a creed without conscience, promulgated by thieves and robbers, and advocates of equal sharing of honest labor's fruits. The Chicago men never advocated any such thing. They were honest, hard-working men and earned their honest living. Those that knew them say that they were friendly and kind, and were not the kind of men the Chicago press made them out to be. They were grossly misrepresented by the press.

HENRY JOHNSON.

PALMYRA, N. Y., March 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The books and papers were received, and I am well pleased with them all; and especially Miss Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods," and I sincerely wish all the women in the land could be prevailed upon to read it. It would be apt to open their eyes to the injustice done them by the false teachings of the Bible. I must tell you my experience in reading it. When I saw the picture of that noble and talented lady I put a paper mark there so as to more readily open to it to show to my friends, and the introduction by Robert G. Ingersoll was so interesting that I had to mark that, and then I commenced putting in marks so as to refer to the most interesting parts of the book, and I was marking every page till I was tired of it and pulled them all out, for one part was as good as another all through the book. It is excellent, and I am glad that nature has produced a miracle in one of our noble women who dare assert the rights of her sex and is not afraid of an imaginary God. I hope there will be many more like her; and there undoubtedly would be if they could be persuaded to read her book. I lend the book to those that will read it, and when it is worn out I will get another one. I tried to get one Christian woman to read it, and she read a little and gave it back to me and said she would not read any more of it. She did not think it right to read it and it was a sin to do so, but she used to get a poor orphan girl up at 5 o'clock in the morning so as to hav plenty of time to scold and make her work hard for her board, and make use of money given the child for clothes. She didn't think that was a sin. And her husband, one of God's own pets according to his own story, would not even touch your paper, the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. He was ashamed to, but he was not ashamed to hav that same little girl overworked, and carry pails of water up to the barn in winter and he sit by the stove. How nice to be a Christian and hav the angels take you to heaven without a heart or pity for a poor, friendless orphan! But she was rescued by a miserable Infidel and is happy now, and with her experience with Christians it is just possible she may think there may be a trifle of goodness outside of that heavenly band. Now, if I was a Christian I would close by saying, God bless Helen H. Gardener and Robert G. Ingersoll and others of like stamp. It is not necessary to say that, for they will be blessed by their own thoughts, and they will be happy in knowing that they hav made others happy, and in doing right because it is right, not through the fear of an imaginary tyrant in an imaginary heaven.

H. P. MARSH.

PAINTED POST, N. Y., April 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed money for my subscription; "The Order of Creation," a discussion between Gladstone, Huxley, etc.; "The Secret of the East," by Felix Oswald, and "The Conflict between Christianity and Civilization," by W. S. Bell.

I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER some four years, and I like it very much. I hav not yet seen anything in its editorials that conflicts with my views. I hav now passed the seventieth milestone in my journey through life. I hav lived in this place forty-seven years; hav always been a hard worker at my business (gunsmith); hav read a good deal for one of my class, and thought more. I am the only outspoken Freethinker in this village. I now propose a question I hav asked a number of orthodox, including ministers, and hav not as yet received a satisfactory answer: If there is a being, the creator of the universe, infinit in power and knowledge, could he create a being with a disposition to act contrary to the will of the creator? It looks to me absurd. We read in the Bible that God repented that he had made man because he was so evil—then God did not know the future or what would be the consequences of his acts—and that on account of his evil conduct he concluded to drown the world, with the exception of one righteous family—another blunder. How does that look for an infinit being with knowledge from eternity to eternity?

I would like to see the book spoken of in the Bible as the book of the wars of Yaveh. I think it would be interesting to read of the brave acts done by him when he was a chief or king on earth before he was deified. He was said to be lord of hosts. Nimrod was his mighty hunter. I presume he liked human flesh, for we read that the first-born of his subjects, children or sons, and of their flocks and herds, were his, and after death and deification the sweet smell of burning flesh had a tendency to appease his wrath. I will close with this, that in my opinion all of the Gods are man-made.

I hav tried to get a few subscribers, but cannot. Some few think as I do, but dare not let it be known for fear it would damage their business, or on account of their wives, who are pious.

B. C. WOOD.

HALE, KAN., April 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: S. M. Bayard, M.D., appears to think he has been terribly scratched by "the feline claws" that he imagins he has found "in the meal;" but I think that if he will wash his slate and solve his mathematical problem over again, he may discover that the "claws" are purely imaginary.

He says, "The Catholic vote now comprises one-third of the votes cast in the United States;" then says, "Double that, and we hav two-thirds of the votes cast." Can he not see that, if the Catholic vote is only one-third, the non-Catholic must be two-thirds, and that doubling the vote does not change the ratio in the least? Or is it possible that he thinks the suffrage movement is intended to giv the franchise only to Catholic women?

Of course, we all "remember the pandering to the papal power of both candidates and both parties, and the presents made to the pope" by our president. We also remember that the panderers are men. We hav not heard of a solitary woman in the suffrage ranks truckling to the pope.

Again he says, "I well know and appreciate all the arguments in favor of woman's suffrage;" and then, in enumerating these arguments, he does not touch a single basic principle. The question is not one of expediency, but of what is right. If "taxation without representation is tyranny" when applied to men, does it change in principle when applied to women? If the right to govern must come from the governed when men are the subjects governed, does the principle change when the subjects to be governed are women?

Then he says man will make as great a sacrifice to secure the rights or redress the wrongs of women as for himself. How many men does he think will stand between woman and the sheriff's hammer when, by man-made law, her little home passes from under her control, and she and her children are rendered homeless?

Here, in Kansas, where women hav more rights in regard to property than in any other state in the Union, there are still great wrongs to be redressed; but men are not in a hurry to right them. I will giv a case in point: A man comes here, locates on a piece of government land, has but little means; times are hard, and he cannot raise the money to pay the government for his land; the secretary issues an order that all lands occupied must be deeded by a given date or be forfeited. This compels him to borrow money and giv a mortgage on his farm. Times get worse; money harder than ever to get. It takes everything produced on the place to pay taxes and interest; but he manages to do this, and the mortgage is not foreclosed; and, if the worst comes, he can get his mortgage renewed; but finally the man dies. Then we see the beauty and justice of man's law to women. The wife has additional expenses to pay, in the shape of doctor's bills and funeral charges; interest day comes, and she cannot raise it, neither will the law permit her to remortgage nor even sell the farm; she is simply compelled to let the mortgage company hav it at their own price, and they never giv more than the amount loaned, which never exceeds one-third of the value; and no man stands ready to make good the loss she has sustained by man-made law.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Little Polly, Jimmy, and I.

If I could hav an isle in the sea
Where the spicy breezes blow,
And the twittering birds could sing to me
With voices soft and low;
Where every star comes down and dips
Its edge in the sea at night,
And children hail the passing ships
With their little 'kerchiefs white,
And the ocean birds go sailing by Sweet little Polly, Jimmy, and I.

And no one dwelling on that isle
But children sweet and fair,
Wand'ring many a happy while
'Mong the fruits and flowers there.
To and fro on the shining sands
While the moon comes out o' the sea,
Sending a message to other lands
When the doves come down to me,
And the stars are low in the purple sky—
Dear little Jimmy, Polly, and I.

Such cool, sweet winds from other shores
To fan the flitting wings,
Ere the red sun climbs the eastern stairs,
And the merman sits and sings;
And every little child of ours
Be free to come and go,
Where the fountain-vine* in tangled bowers
Is tinkling faint and low—
Near to the gate o' the sea and sky
My own little Polly, Jimmy, and I.

A Romantic History.

Two children in a by-gone day
Lived in a sylvan dell,
Together they did daily play
Around a moss-grown well.
The parents of both girl and boy
Were gratified to see
How well their offspring could enjoy
Each other's company.
Few pleasures did the children lack;
They romped and played at will;
The little urchin's name was Jack;
The young girl's name was Jill.
And oft they climbed the grassy mound—
Full fifty feet in hight—
Whence came the bubbling well-spring's sound
Like music day and night.
It chanced one day—one fatal day—
That little son and daughter
Uphill in gladness went their way
To fill a pail with water.
Their merry laughter filled the air,
Their voices rang with glee,
Youth, innocence, and mirth were there
Blent in sweet harmony.
Ah! little did each guileless heart
Foresee the fearful fate
Which did, with swift, unerring dart,
Their childish steps await.
That little boy had scarcely topped
The hill, when lo! he tripped,
And from his hand the pail he dropped
As down the hill he slipped.
Jill caught the pail—saw Jack's foot fall
As in the grass he stuck it—
Then she herself turned very pale
For fear he'd kick the bucket!
With bosom rent with painful shocks
She watched his downward course,
Until his body struck the rocks
With most terrific force
The truth flashed through her mind exact,
And to herself she said:
"Jack's pericranium is cracked—
My little playmate's dead!
How can I liv? Can I survive
My friend—my more than brother?
I loved him when he was alive,
I ne'er can love another!"
Then she head-foremost down the hill
Fell in her comrade's track,
And thus the corpse of little Jill
Was found with that of Jack.
And so the task I had to do,
With joy I now fulfill,
By giving to the world this true
Account of Jack and Jill.

Correspondence.

ARMSTRONG, IA., April 19, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: The Liberal book that I hav read is "Little Lessons for Little Folks." The snow was all gone, and yesterday it started to rain, and then it changed into snow. It all melted away to-day, and the men are working in the field. My brother and I are just getting over an attack of sore eyes.

I would like the children of the Corner to write and describe the country that they liv in. We liv in the northwestern part of Iowa. The climate is very hot in the summer and severely cold in the winter. The east branch of the Desmoines river runs south and west of our place. This part of the country is thickly settled.

I would like to belong to the Speak No Evil Society. It is not right to call the people names when they call you names. It only belittles yourself. I would like to correspond with Ethel G. Streeter, if she should see this letter; she lives in the state I would like to liv in. I send my love to you.

Yours truly, ETHEL BURT.

BARRE, MASS., April 26, 288.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Can you say a few words in your Children's Corner in commendation of "Belle Long" and its author? She is a very worthy young woman, living in Merrimac, Wis. She published the book just before the Liberal was suspended, expecting that paper would advertise it, and is left in the lurch. It would be a great favor if you could say you had read the book, liked it, and it was kept for sale by its author, Adelaide Randall, Merrimac, Wis., price six cents, including postage. I hav no other object in view but to aid her. She wants to get her money back; writes me she would be glad if she could get back as many cents as she has expended dollars.

Please excuse all. I hav been unusually ill for two months, and only took up my pen to oblige and aid Miss Randall.

Yours for truth, ELLA E. GIBSON.

["Belle Long" is a well-told little story, and almost anyone can spare six cents to help a poor girl on and to get her money back. All good Liberal effort should be encouraged.—ED. C. C.]

OMAHA, NEB., April 22, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Inclosed I send you a little book with views of Omaha, which a gentleman gave me at school one day. This book has views which I think are not in the illustrated Bee.

The two sample letters mamma told me to clip from the daily World and send to you, where you can read all about Omaha.

ANNIE S. COLVIN.

[Annie will please accept thanks for the pretty book of views, and also her mamma has our thanks for the interesting slips. Omaha must be a very stirring place, and her people bright and wide awake. It does one good to read of so much life and energy.—ED. C. C.]

SPRING GROVE, ILL., April 17, 1888.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Madam: I will again try to write a few lines to your interesting Corner.

My grandpa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for many years, and since the first of this year papa has taken it. I like the pictures very much and am much interested in the Children's Corner. The compositions from the young Liberals are very good. I think that George Remsburg writes very nicely.

I liv on a farm of 321 acres. I hav to go about a mile and three-fourths to school. I study reading, arithmetic, history, grammar, geography, and spelling.

I do not hav many household pets, but I hav two little sisters and two brothers.

We hav an organ, but I hav never taken any lessons yet. I hope to, some time soon.

If this letter appears in print, I will write again some time and try to do better.

With best respects to the Corner, I remain,
Your friend,
GRACE A. STEVENS (aged fourteen).

PRINCETON, MO., April 7, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am not a child, but I hav four children, and they are all genuin little truth seekers. They ask questions that would puzzle a divine. I believe that we are the only avowed Infidel family in Mercer county. I see a letter from Jennie Gigray, of Osceola, Iowa. She livs close to my husband's brother, Joe Graves. They say that Jennie is such a smart little girl. I like to read the little folks' letters—they are so free from guile. I think our next generation will be so much better than the present one on account of the advance of Liberal ideas. I think every little reader of the Children's Corner ought to cut out the piece, "Don't Do It," written in THE TRUTH SEEKER by Miss Wixon, March 24th, and put it where they can read it every morning when they get up. Miss Wixon, go ahead with your good work; you are doing more good than a dozen preachers. Yours truly,

MRS. ELLA M. GRAVES.

[Thanks for the kindly sentiments above. The approval of the readers of the Corner, and the consciousness that we are doing a little good in the world, are incentivs to continue the work in which we are engaged.—ED. C. C.]

An Ant Funeral.

The following incident appears in the "Proceedings of the Linnean Society," having been communicated to that learned body by an observer in Australia. The writer saw a large number of ants surrounding some that he had killed, and determined to watch their proceedings closely. Accordingly he followed four or five that started off from the rest toward a hillock a short distance off, in which was an ant's nest. This they entered, and in about five minutes they reappeared, followed by others. All fell into rank, regularly and slowly, two by two, until they arrived at the spot where lay the dead bodies of the soldier ants.

In a few minutes two of the ants advanced and took up the body of one of their comrades, then two others, and so on, until all were ready to march. First walked two ants bearing a body, and then two without a burden, then two others with another dead ant, and so on, until the line was extended to about forty pairs, and the procession now moved slowly onward, followed by an irregular body of about two hundred ants. Occasionally the two laden ants stopped, and laying down the dead body it was taken up by the two walking unburdened behind them, and thus, by occasionally relieving each other, they arrived at a sandy spot near the sea.

The body of ants now commenced digging with their jaws a number of holes in the ground, in each of which a dead ant was laid. Then they all fell to and filled up the graves. This did not quite finish the remarkable circumstances attending the insect funeral. Some six or seven of the ants had attempted to run off without performing their share of the task of digging; these were caught and brought back, when they were at once attacked and killed on the spot. A single grave was quickly dug, and they were all dropped into it.

Fruits of Columbia.

The fruits and vegetables in Columbia are delicious, and grow without culture or care. The plantain is in universal use, and is always served as a vegetable. It is fried and boiled when the skin is yellow, when it is known as "green" plantain, and when it is black and the fruit is considered thoroughly ripe. The banana is never fried in the tropics, but is always served as a fruit. There are many varieties of banana. One of the most delicious species in flavor and fragrance is the little Guinea banana, which is scarcely a finger in length. The red banana is not a different species, but a variety produced by grafting at Baracoa, Spain. All the bananas in Columbia are yellow. The caruba, or passion flower fruit, the custard apple, called by an enthusiastic traveler "the spiritualized strawberry," and the guava are all delicious fruits which never reach our northern markets in perfection.

Four Drinks.

Policeman No. 67 was an older and more thoughtful man than is usually found on the municipal force. He was retained, in spite of his gray hairs, because of his stanch integrity. He was apt, in his leisure moments, to look below the misery and crime which came in his way, to find their cause.

"I was once standing in front of Tuft's saloon," he said, one day, "when the barkeeper set down a blue bottle on the counter, and said, 'There are just four drinks in that.' It occurred to me I'd like to trace up them four drinks—where they went and what they did.

"Well," continued the policeman, "a woman got the first glass. She wasn't an old woman, nor used to whisky; about thirty years old, had been pretty once, and accustomed to having a gay time, I suppose. She was on her way home now from a day's hard work, tired and cold, and the whisky was a temptation. It would take the place of the dance and theater and fun. She turned down into a by-street, and stopped at the door of a snug little house.

"I knew her husband, Crafts, the carpenter, a cheerful, hard-working fellow. He opened the door, and her baby ran out to meet her. She struck it down to the ground with an oath. Her husband looked at her, and fell back as though he, too, had been struck. Then he picked up the child and carried it into the pretty, warm room. I saw the mother lying stretched across the hearth as though she were dead.

"The second drink out of the bottle, the barkeeper told me, was given to old Stacy. He is nigh seventy, and soaked with liquor; blood, stomach, and brain poisoned by it. There's not a healthy atom of flesh left in his body, not a good feeling in his heart, nor a manly thought in his head. The drink only helped, with all the liquor that he has drunk, to kill him surely inch by inch.

"By this time I had got back to the saloon, and in a few minutes I saw a young man named Waters stop for the next. He had been drinking already; I called to him. I used to know Waters, a young clerk, with a good salary; had a nice little home, and pretty wife and babies. He's quarrelsome in drink, and a glass or two upsets him.

"'Waters,' I said, 'don't drink that; you've had enough.'

"But he laughed, took his drink, and went down the street. A few minutes later I heard a row going on and followed him. He had picked a quarrel with one of his friends and shot him dead. Waters was sentenced to ten years; his home is broken up; his wife takes in washing to keep her children from starving.

"There was one drink left in the bottle. An hour later a young lad came in, a bright-faced boy, the son of Dr. Bunker. He's about sixteen now. I've watched him grow up since he was a baby in his pretty lace dresses. I know what he is to his mother. They hav but this one child. I think they never heard of a good or great man that they do not fancy Jim will be like him.

"He tossed off the drink, and went down the street, with a red face and leering, stupid eyes. He is on the same road as Waters and old Stacy. They are a little ahead of him.

"I only traced up those four drinks; but I know there is not a drop of liquor which goes out of Tuft's saloon which does not help to carry discomfort, ill-temper, misery, disease, poverty, and disgrace into some wretched, unfortunate home."—Youth's Companion.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

That Badger Boy At Sunday-School.

THE LESSON OF MOSES AND PHARAOH.

"I will read you a portion of the story of Moses and Aaron," said the teacher on this "holy Sabbath" morn, and forthwith proceeded to read the interesting fables relating to the above-named personages, at the conclusion saying to the children—hers was a boys' class—that any of them could ask such questions as the reading prompted, urging them to do so. None had any questions to ask, apparently, and for a wonder that boy James was backward in coming forward, all the others looking at him as though expecting, if not indeed hoping, that he would come to the front as their representativ. Shortly he shied his castor into the ring, figurativly speaking, and, after some light sparring, struck out from the shoulder, as it were, with telling effect.

"I know what Mose and Aaron said to one another, mum. Said Aaron to Moses, let's cut off our noses; said Moses to Aaron, it's the fashion to wear 'em."

This pleased the boys, and the teacher smiled and chided not.

"Some facetious rhymester was the author of those lines, James, and not Moses and Aaron."

"Yes'm. Was Faro a free agent, mum?"

"Certainly, James."

"What did God harden Faro's heart with, mum—glue water or plaster Paris?"

"James Badger, I'm ashamed of you!"

"No'm, don't. Was Faro a free agent then, mum?" (This was the shot from the shoulder, and, in the vernacular of slang, it "knocked the teacher silly." Like the boy who rolled out of bed, she for a moment had nothing to say, but finally shc stammered a response.)

"Er—was Pharaoh—er—a free—I declare, James, you—er—ask such—er—strange questions! I never saw such another boy. When God hardened—er—Pharaoh's heart, Pharaoh was—er [here she received "inspiration"]—well, God didn't want him to be a free agent then, and that's all there was about it." (Alas for the "inspiration!" She had put her foot in it—not in the inspiration, but as understood.)

"Then he done just as God wanted him to, didn't he, mum? So what did God sour onto him for?"

"James Badger, you're just too irreverent for anything, and I shan't answer your wicked questions, there now!"

"Yes'm. There wasn't no bullfrogs in the bulrushes where the woman left the kid, was there, mum?"

"Bullfrogs! How do I know, you little monkey you!—the idea!"

"Huh! you might know well 'nuff, mum, 'cos no woman would wade in where a lot of bullfrogs was—I'll bet you wouldn't, not bare leg——"

"You James Badger, you stop, now!"

"Yes'm. Why didn't Mose turn a whole lot o' sticks into snakes, mum, and open a dime museum?"

"O you wicked little wretch! I wish I could turn you into a ——"

"What—a snake? I bet you don't, mum. I'd scare your liver'n lights out, you bet!"

"You wretched boy!—you go right home this minute."

"No'm—don't. I'll bet you'd knock spots outer Faro's daughter for good looks, mum. I'm offle fond of obbun hair, mum." (This piece of taffy mollified the aged maid.)

"Are you, dear? You don't know how pleased I am to know it, James."

"Yes'm. Was it fair shakes for God to harden Faro's heart, mum? Why didn't he let the duffer play his own hand? as pop says."

"James, we mustn't ask such questions."

"No'm. What made the Lord keep tellin' Mose that he was the Lord all the time? Couldn't Mose remember, mum, or was he shaky 'bout b'lievin'?"

"James, you must not talk so."

"No'm. It was nip and tuck, as pop says, with Mose and Faro's sharps on the magic racket, wasn't it, mum? There wasn't no flies on Mose in that fly time he fetched on, though."

"O you boy! do stop, will you?"

"Yes'm. Would you like to been in Egypt when them lice——"

"O you horrid, horrid boy! Do go home!"

"No'm—don't. Them 'Gypshens was muffs to lend the Sheneys all their jewelry, wasn't they, mum?"

"They couldn't help it, you boy; God made them do so."

"Wasn't it mean for God to put up such a job——"

"You James Badger, I wonder God does not strike you dead this minute!"

"Would he strike a little boy dead, mum? That wouldn't be no fair shakes, mum. He'd better take a fellow of his size. Why don't he knock out the devil—is the devil too many for him, mum?"

"You Badger boy—you awful wretch!—do you want me to call the superintendent?"

"Yes'm. The super's mashed on you, mum. He's just dead gone on your lovely obbun hair, mum."

"James, dear, you mustn't talk so."

"No'm. Why didn't God build a bridge for the Sheneys, mum? Gouldn't he done it?"

"Of course, but he chose to divide the waters, James."

"What was he so sweet on the Sheneys for, mum?"

"You mustn't speak of them in that way, James. They were Hebrews."

"Yes'm. But Hebrews is Sheneys, mum."

"Do stop, you boy, do."

"Yes'm. Where was Mose when the light went out, mum?"

"I won't listen to any more of your wicked questions, you James Badger."

"No'm. Didn't the Lord promis to go with the Sheneys once, mum, and back out?"

"You needn't ask me any such questions."

"No'm. Was the calf solid gold, mum, or plated?"

"Shut up, you wicked boy!"

"Yes'm. Didn't Mose hav the gall, mum, when he told the Lord to repent?" (Severe silence on the teacher's part.) "Them Sheneys had lots o' quail on toast, didn't they, mum?"

"Now, you James Badger, you go home. I won't listen another minute to such a little wretch! The class is dismissed." Thus broke up the séance of Moses and Pharaoh.

Obituary.

A. Wallace Hughan, for many years a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, died suddenly at his cigar store in Oakland, Cal., on Saturday, April 14th. He was a member of St. Andrew's Society, and the Presbyterian chaplain of that society, the Rev. Mr. McLean, would hav been employed to officiate at the funeral but for Mr. Hughan's request that Mr. A. H. Shou, a fellow-Freethinker, should say the last words made necessary and appropriate by his death. The Oakland Enquirer gave the following account of the services:

The burial of the late A. Wallace Hughan, yesterday, was more devoid of funeral ceremonies, perhaps, than any other interment which has taken place in Mountain View cemetery at which there were friends or relativs to bear the corpse to the grave. There were no religious services of any kind. During the earlier part of the day the body lay in a handsome coffin at Evers's undertaking rooms on Washington street. There were enough white roses and other pale blossoms, which had been sent by friends of the deceased, to almost cover the coffin from view, and several wreaths rested against the supports of the bier. The face of the deceased was natural, and wore a peaceful look.

At 3 o'clock twenty or thirty friends of the deceased, including a delegation from St. Andrew's Society, of which the deceased had been a member, had assembled. The coffin was closed and placed in the hearse, and, attended by the pall-bearers, the procession started for the cemetery. Arrived there, the spot selected for the grave was found to be on a side-hill on the southern side of the cemetery, not far from the first fountain. The pall-bearers, who were H. Youngs, William Collins, J. L. McKay, A. H. Shou, Captain Todd, and John H. Kirk, placed the coffin on the brink of the grave.

Deceased had requested Mr. Samuel Putnam, the well-known orator of the Freethinkers, to make an address at his grave, but Mr. Putnam was unavoidably absent. A. H. Shou, however, came forward and spoke as follows:

"By the will of our friend, and in the absence of Mr. Putnam, I am called upon to say a few words at our friend's grave—a task I hav never heretofore been called upon to perform; still, I must not evade his last request. We are here not to praise our friend; we are here not to blame him; we are here to bury his body. His wish, as expressed in his will, was that his body should be cremated, but in the absence of a crematory in this city or in San Francisco, his friends, the members of the St. Andrew's Society, believed it would be more in accordance with the other request stated in the will, viz., that the funeral should be of the simplest and most inexpensiv kind, to bury the body at Mountain View cemetery, than to go to the expense and trouble of sending the remains to Los Angeles to be cremated. And I, as one of his friends and companions in his Liberal and tolerant view of things, heartily concur in this belief. The opinion of our friend as to cremation being the best way to dispose of the body was not a sentiment, but a sincere conviction; and if his friends should contend for carrying out his wish in this respect, they believe they would err in the other extreme on account of sentiment.

"Now as to our friend as we knew him. He was very humane; he had a kind heart and a conscientious mind; he was tolerant of other men's convictions, and was honest and truthful in his dealings. With regard to creeds he believed that they had an average fitness to the minds of those who professed to believe them, but as these minds were ever in process of changing, the creeds were becoming unfit to represent the progress of the ages, and therefore should be cast off as an old suit of clothes whenever they became outworn, outgrown, or unseemly. With such a mind this man was always tolerant of the opinions of other men and demanded the same tolerance of his own.

"Now, as our friend was always fond of flowers, and as my wife and I often carried him a bouquet, we will for the last time place these blossoms on his casket."

This address being concluded, the casket was lowered into the grave by the undertaker's assistants, the earth was thrown into it, and the circle of friends stood around and watched the labor in sorrow and silence. When it was completed they quietly dispersed.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

Gems of Thought.

OH, but you say I take away immortality. I do not. If we are immortal it is a fact in nature, and we are not indebted to priests for it, nor to Bibles for it, and it cannot be destroyed by unbelief. As long as we love we will hope to liv, and when the one dies that we love, we will say, Oh, that we could meet again! And whether we do or not it will not be the work of theology. It will be a fact in nature.—Ingersoll.

THERE are no more characteristic illustrations of the practical leanings of the activ American mind, as it seems to me, than Ingersoll, his lectures and his audiences; and, in face of these examples, nothing puzzles me more than the patience with which this great, busy, practical, freedom-loving race submits to the swindling and tyranny of national corporations. —Hatton's To-day in America.

I HAV been in the bright summer-time to a church in the country. I hav there heard the old, false, tyrannous dogmas of man's vileness, his sin, and his redemption by vicarious sacrifice, and the gloomy doctrins of the churches. And what a relief to go forth into the free air, to hear the birds sing, to see the fleecy white clouds, to see the sunlight dance and glisten among the rustling leaves, and breathe in the beauty and peace of nature! So may the world leave the gloomy halls of ignorance and tradition, and step forth into the fields where is taught the peaceful gospel of humanity. The fact of being implies the right to liv and to be happy; but behind the fact of being we cannot go. Let God be known by gods, but humanity by man.—J. E. Peck.

THE great distinction between man and the brute lies in this, that the brute is impelled only by instinct, and applies itself solely to that object which is present and before it, with very little sense of the past or the future; but man, because endowed with reason, by which he discerns consequences, looks into the causes of things and their progress, and being acquainted, as it were, with their precedents, he compares their analogies, and adapts and connects the present with the future. It is easy for him to foresee the future direction of all his life, and therefore he prepares whatever is necessary for passing through it.—Cicero.

BUT, mousie, thou art no thy lane,
In proving foresight may be vain;
The best-laid schemes o' mice an' men,
Gang aft agley,
An' lea'e us nought but grief and pain,
For promised joy.

Still thou art blest, compared wi' me!
The present only toucheth thee;
But, och! I backward cast my e'e
On prospects drear;
An' forward, though I canna see,
I guess an' fear.

SAY, first, of God above or man below,
What can we reason, but from what we know?
Of man, what see we but his station here,
From which to reason, or to which refer?
Through worlds unnumbered though the God be known,
'Tis ours to trace him only in our own.
He who through vast immensity can pierce,
See worlds on worlds compose one universe,
Observe how system into system runs,
What other planets circle other suns,
What varied being peoples every star,
May tell why heaven has made us as we are:
But of this frame, the bearings, and the ties,
The strong connections, nice dependencies,
Gradations just, has thy forwarding soul
Looked through, or can a part contain the whole?
—Pope's Essay on Man.

WE figure society as a machine, and think that mind is opposed to mind as body is to body; whereby two, or, at most, ten little minds must be stronger than one great mind. Notable absurdity! The plain truth, very plain, we think, is that minds are opposed to minds in quite a different way; and one man, that has a hitherto higher wisdom, a hitherto unknown spiritual truth in him, is stronger, not than ten men that hav it not, or than ten thousand, but than all men that hav it not; and stands among them with a quite ethical, angelic power, as with a sword out of heaven's own armory, sky-tempered, which no buckler and no tower of brass will finally withstand.—Carlyle.

No real greatness can long co exist with deceit. The whole faculties of the man must be exerted in order to noble energies, and he who is not earnestly sincere livs in but half his being, self-mutilated and self-paralyzed.—Coleridge's Friend.

TOILING, rejoicing, sorrowing,
Onward through life he goes;
Each morning sees some task begun,
Each evening sees it close;
Something attempted, something done,
Has earned a night's repose.

FROM New York to Montreal seems to be the standing jump.

A WEST End tailor has stamped upon his billheads a picture of the forget-me-not.

WE hav no doubt that the "Dead March" in "Saul" is very beautiful; but our entire thanksgiving is reserved just now for the dead March in 1888.

FIRST actor: "The new man they've got at the Star is a regular stuff." Second actor: "Poor actor, is he?" First actor: "Poor? Why, he can't even imitate Irving!"

"MR. SMITH gone abroad?" "Yes; my husband is on the Continent for his health." "I thought he was well enough." "No; there was a weakness in the spinal column of his ledger."

THE candidate's boomlet now bunglingly boometh,
And bashfully buzzeth the beggarly bee;
In the bulge of his bonnet it busily hummeth
A song like the sob of the sad sounding sea.

HE was a baseball player, and he asked a girl to marry him. "Out on first," she said, with a cold, rejectiv smile. "Don't flatter yourself," he replied, as he picked himself up, "it's out on third."

TEACHER: "How do you spell 'coffee?'" First boy: "C-o-f-f-y." Teacher: "Wrong; next." Second boy: "K-o-u-g-h-y." Teacher: "Wrong; next." Third boy: "C-h-i-c-o-r-y." Teacher: "Correct!"

MRS. LARDINE (of Chicago): "Really, Mr. Bigfee, I think that $500 for so simple a matter as a divorce is quite exorbitant!" Mr. Bigfee (firmly but respectfully): "Those are my usual terms, madam." Mrs. Lardine (with hauteur): "Very well, sir, you may write a receipt, but I hav never paid so much before, and I never will again."

"WILLIE," said the good pastor, who was taking dinner with the family, "I suppose you will be a literary man, like your father, when you grow up." "Nope," said the little boy addressed, as he looked at the somewhat meager array of delicacies on the table with lofty scorn, "literary nuthin'! I'm goin' to be a ten-thousand-dollar cook!"

OLD gentleman (getting his boots blacked Sunday morning): "Boy, do you know what the good book says, 'Remember the Sabbath day?'" Bootblack: "Yessir, I allers remembers it." Old gentleman: "Then you go to Sunday-school, do you?" Bootblack: "No, sir; I don't go to Sunday-school, but I charges ten cents fer a shine."

CERTAINLY William Shakspere was unconscious of his high poetic merits, notwithstanding his prophecy of fame in the Sonnets. Does not the great Emerson tell us that "Bill did better than he knew?"

"DID your son take the valedictory in college?" said a gentleman to a lady who was enthusiastically praising the ability of her offspring. "No, indeed, he didn't," she replied, with pride, "he didn't take anything. He is the healthiest boy you ever saw."

MORIARTY (just landed): "It's a wondherful foine counthry this is for furriners, Paddy. Here ye've only been over a year, and ye look loike a rale gintleman." O'Houlihan: "Furriners, ye say! The only furriners here are the Chinee haythens, and they've got to git out."

WIFE: "Now, John, tell me candidly why an old baldheaded man like you should want to go to the show to-night?" "Well, I'd like to see the ballet girls, if you must know. But I can't imagin why you should want to go." "You can't? Why, I want to see the handsome old gentlemen who occupy the front seats."

A YOUNG school-girl: "Oh, mamma! please mayn't I read romances? Lucy Jones does, and she isn't a day older than I am. I peeped into her book the other day, and the last two lines read, 'And they were married and lived happily afterward.'" Mamma: "That wasn't a romance, my dear; it was a fairy tale."

GIRLS is queer! I used to think
Emmy didn't care for me,
For, whenever I would try
Any lovin' arts, to see
How she'd take 'em—sweet or sour—
Always, saucy like says she:
"Quit your foolin'!"

Once, agoin' home from church,
Jest to find if it would work,
Round her waist I slipped my arm—
My! you'd ought to seen her jerk,
Spunky? well, she acted so—
And she snapped me up as perk—
"Quit your foolin'!"

Every time 'twas just the same,
Till one night I says, says I—
Chokin' some, I must admit,
Tremblin' some, I don't deny—
"Emmy, seein' as I don't suit,
Guess I'd better say 'good-bye,'
An' quit foolin'."

Girls is queer! She only laughed—
Cheeks all dimplin'; "John," says she,
"Foolin' men that never gits
Real in earnest, ain't for me."
Wa'nt that cute? I took the hint,
An' a chair, an' stayed, an' we
Quit our foolin'.

ONE of the newly elected pages of the Iowa House of Representativs is a ten-year-old girl.

THE Vatican has received a dispatch from the papal nuncio at Paris, stating that the disputes between France and the Vatican hav been satisfactorily settled.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY, who is now staying at Bournemouth, England, has been seriously ill during the spring, and he has been ordered to proceed to Switzerland for the benefit of his health as soon as the weather becomes fine and settled.

IN Death Valley, Ariz., there are thousands of acres covered with a deposit of borax two feet thick, and near by immense quantities of salt, lime, and soda. The locality is ninety feet below the level of the sea, and is evidently the bed of a dried-up sea.

REV. EDWARD HOPPER, of New York, died suddenly while writing a poem on heaven. He was a Presbyterian.—Wilmington Star. This should be a warning to people who write on tariffs, European politics, or any subject of which they know nothing.—New Orleans Picayune.

AT the Religious Press Club dinner last week, H. K. Carroll, of the Independent, called the attention of the brethren to the decrease in the acrimony of religious editors toward each other in recent years. Twenty years ago, he said, one religious editor called another religious editor "a ravening jackal," and the other religious editor retorted that the first religious editor was "a Christian ignorancer."

A NEW revivalist, the Rev. J. B. Culpepper, has arisen in Georgia. This is the way he preaches: "I would rather be a negro with red eyes, kinky wool, boneless nose, and a hollow of the foot that makes a hole in the ground, than play poker till 1 o'clock in the morning, and go home and deceive my wife about it."

THE Tennessee Supreme Council of the Catholic Knights of America has taken the same course as was taken recently by the Quadrennial Conference of Methodists, in refusing to admit women to membership. For years past women hav been appealing to this Supreme Council; but at last, when the appeal was taken up, it has barred its doors against them.

SIR WILLIAM VERNON HARCOURT spoke at Croydon, England, last week. Referring to the papal rescript, he said that, with all respect to the pope, he would remind his audience that the court of Rome had not been successful in its dealings with temporal politics. It had, in fact, been distinguished for having allied itself with the worst forms of oppressiv government.

JUDGE GREEN, of Oakland, Cal., has recently delivered an opinion on the subject of Spiritualism. It was in the case of Hannah Traver, who claims to be a "sensitiv" medium, examined as to her sanity. The judge said: "The physicians upon their oath decide that Mrs. Traver is not insane, and that she is entitled to her discharge. In this I concur with them. I am not a believer in Spiritualism, so called; I do know, however, that there are a great many people who do believe in it, and many who are considered level-headed. If we were to consider this belief an evidence of insanity, and people were to be committed for it, we would hav to enlarge the insane asylums. In this case I believe that, while this person may be off on this subject, she is not insane."

SOME one has been asking help from the Christian Union, of this city, on the great and vital question of whether a Christian should patronize baseball. This is the answer he gets: "There is no reason why baseball should not be redeemed from the evils which are incidental, not essential, to it. But what chance a Christian young man has to withstand these influences and redeem the game from them we will not judge."

AT Salt Lake City recently argument was made in the territorial supreme court to forfeit and escheat to the state some $12,000 worth of alleged Mormon church property. With hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of church property in Washington subject to the same laws as that in Utah, and a three-million-dollar Catholic university about to be built, comments Freethought, it is strange that the government should vex itself over the insignificant possessions of a Mormon bishop.

A HISTORICAL incident remembered by Life: "In 1868, when Seymour and Grant were running for president, there was a gathering of the Second Adventists, in July, at Milwaukee. These people, it will be remembered, believed that the world was coming to an end in September. One morning one of the clergymen found a Democrat from Kentucky and a Republican discussing the approaching election. He said: 'Gentlemen, there is no use in discussing this question, for before that time the Lord will reign triumphant throughout the world.' The Democrat replied, 'I will bet you $25 he can't carry Kentucky.'"

FROM Harpers' Weekly: "The recent squabble in the Senate between Mr. Ingalls, of Kansas, and Mr. Voorhees, of Indiana, is a national disgrace. The Senate of the United States, we hav been accustomed to think and to say, is the most dignified legislativ body in the world. But its president during a personal altercation says to a fellow-member, 'If this were a police court the senator from Indiana would be sent to the rock pile for being drunk and disorderly;' and the senator from Indiana replies that the president of the Senate is 'a great liar and a dirty dog.' Yet we profess great indignation when Matthew Arnold suggests that our civilization is in some respects open to criticism."

THE Globe-Democrat prints a letter from Colonel Ingersoll to Rev. E. P. Powell, an Infidel Christian of this state, giving the reasons why he favors the nomination of Gresham for president by the Republican party. He writes: "I am in favor of Gresham for the following reasons: 1. He is a man of intelligence, well read, mentally trained; 2. His character is good; he is an honest, faithful man; 3. He has filled with honor every position in which he has been; he was a private soldier; he became a general; he did his duty; 4. He was a judge; he decided according to the best of his ability; he was merciful as well as firm; 5. He was a cabinet officer; he was natural, clear-headed, and firm; 6. He is now a judge, and no political ambition has warped or can warp his judgment; 7. His record is clean, and he can be elected."

The Sin of Patriotism.

Patriotism has been for ages an unquestioned virtue. "Dulce et decorum est pro patriâ mori." The patriot who distinguishes himself in his country's service has this fact counted to him for righteousness, and by it his name secures such immortality as monuments and historians can bestow, although his private virtues are insignificant and his vices notorious. Few statements are less controverted than that of the copy-book maxim, "Patriotism is a virtue." Our children sing:

> Of all the lands in east or west,
> I love my nativ land the best.

And the poet heaps scorn upon the man,

> With soul so dead,
> Who never to himself has said,
> This is my own, my nativ land!

When one ceases to accept religious dogmas upon authority, and subjects them to the test of reason, this new habit of mind gradually asserts itself, and questionings arise as to the rightfulness of all established institutions and the merit of all current opinions. No regard is paid to the sentiment expressed in the pidgin-English phrase of the Chinaman, "That belong old custom," and no habit or idea, however venerable, is respected unless it is found to be in harmony with the recognized methods of natural law and with those principles of justice to which the heart of advanced humanity assents.

Looked at in this light, is patriotism good and desirable, or is it a survival of savagery, disguised selfishness, injustice to mankind at large, a hindrance to progress, and therefore evil, or, in theological term, a sin?

Patriotism in essence is the desire or effort to advance one's nativ land over all others; to make it the richest, most powerful, largest, and most prosperous of countries. The methods of patriotism in the past, and largely in the present, hav been and are the subjugation of countries by force; the annexing of territory by diplomacy, intrigue, or taking possession; the enactment of prohibitory or protectiv tariffs; bounties for home productions and discriminating taxes against foreign nations, with such various methods of self-assertion and aggrandizement as correspond in spirit to the effort of a barbarian to exalt himself over his fellows.

As far as patriotism is inspired by the desire to advance human welfare by exemplifying the practice of good methods and principles in one's own nation, it is a virtuous sentiment; and as far as its effect is to promote the progress of society its result is admirable; but men need to learn that its only justification is benefit to individuals, and that efforts to enhance the prestige of a nation are no more worthy of respect than are private greed and vanity. There is no ethical reason why the name of a nation should be attached to Arctic wastes or to distant isles. The passion for territorial expansion, exclusiv privileges, grand totals of population and financial statistics, great armies, navies, and trappings of national glory, is only a refinement upon the savage chieftain's pride and adds no more to the welfare of individuals. Nor is there any ethical reason why geographical lines should determin the relationships of men; why a man in Maine should regard his neighbor in New Brunswick as an alien with whom it is undesirable to trade, lest the profit should be shared by a man who has a different-colored strip of bunting flying over his head on festiv occasions. The accidents of birth hav too long affected men's demeanor toward each other. With the disappearance of hereditary legislation, primogeniture, bequeathed title and position, must come also the end of what is commonly understood by the word patriotism.

The natural considerations for intercourse with others are mutual personal advantage and character, not conventional badges, freemasonry, nationality, or race. Even the claim of kinship, beyond that of parent and child, is not in accord with natural morality, and that will be limited if the ideas of state Socialism are realized.

As man has risen socially through the organizations of village, tribe, state, and nation, ever expanding his recognition of his fellows, he is clearly destined to sink national distinctions and regard men as worthy of association according to personal characteristics and the advantages of their connection, irrespectiv of habitat or flag. When the brotherhood of man is recognized all over the world, perhaps we shall hav advanced to communication with other worlds and our self-improving object will then be to outgrow our patriotic pride in the earth and remove all prejudicial hindrances to intercourse with the inhabitants of Venus, and go on to secure the relationship of the universe!

But at present we need consider only our immediate duty, and from the above principles it would appear that national aggrandizement by injury to others is foolish and sinful, and that the duty of all is to expand the enthusiasm of patriotism till with the noted Freethinker they can say, "The world is my country."

Many will say that all this is stale morality; but it is certain that it is not often acted upon, and if any citizen of the United States considers these views correct, it is his immediate duty to use his influence and vote to abolish protectiv tariffs; to repeal the laws that prevent the purchase of foreign-built ships, that levy extra dues on foreign tonnage, and that exclude foreign vessels from the coasting trade; to promote reciprocal trade; to secure uniform international laws relating to arbitration, extradition, weights, measurements, coinage, and all useful harmonies; to reduce armies, navies, and all aggressiv expenditures; and where patriotism does apply to national affairs let it be in the direction of setting an example to the world by successful effort in securing to the people the largest benefits and replacing the present oppressiv system of competition and monopoly by the principle of coöperation and association.

Montreal, Can. ROBERT C. ADAMS

Mrs. Ritchey Set Right.

Mrs. Ritchey, of Fossil, Ore., has a communication in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 31st, in which she rightly recognizes the fact that no person of logical acumen can be an evolutionist and at the same time a Christian. After mature deliberation, she has discarded evolution and accepted the Bible. At least, she thinks she has.

She says: "As far as my knowledge extends I find that no fact in nature, rightly seen, is contradictory to any part of Genesis, rightly interpreted;" and she requests that, if she has come to any wrong conclusions, some of your readers will set her right.

Now, to begin with, we hav a right to know if Mrs. Ritchey really believes the Bible. That phrase, "rightly interpreted," has furnished a foundation for an immense amount of muddled thinking, equivocation, downright dishonesty, and cold-blooded cruelty. No honest person who actually believes the Bible will torture its words out of their obvious and ordinary meaning. Has Mrs. Ritchey ever considered what Bible cosmogony and Bible chronology really are? Here is an epitome of Bible cosmogony from the article Firmament in Smith's Bible Dictionary. Heston's illustration is rational in comparison:

> The Hebrew term rakia, so translated, is generally regarded as expressiv of simple expansion, and is so rendered in the margin of the authorized version (Gen. i, 6). The root means, to expand by beating, whether by the hand, the foot, or any instrument. It is especially used of beating out metals into thin plates (Ex. xxxix, 3; Num. xvi, 39). The sense of solidity, therefore, is combined with the idea of expansion and tenuity in the term. The same idea of solidity runs through all references to rakia. In Ex. xxiv, 10, it is represented as a solid floor. So again in Ex. i, 22–26, the "firmament" is the floor on which the throne of the most high is placed. Further, the office of the rakia in the economy of the world demanded strength and substance. It was to serve as a division between the waters above and the waters below (Gen. i, 7). In keeping with this view the rakia was provided with windows (Gen. vii, 11; Isa. xxiv, 18; Mal. iii, 10) and doors (Isa. lxxviii, 23) through which the rain and the snow may descend. A secondary purpose which the rakia served was to support the heavenly bodies—sun, moon, and stars—(Gen. i, 14), in which they were driven as nails, and from which, consequently, they might be said to drop off (Isa. xiv, 12; xxxiv, 4; Matt. xxiv, 29).

Does Mrs. Ritchey believe that "in six days the Lord made the heaven and the earth, the sea and all that in them is" (Ex. xx, 11), or has she expanded these days into protracted periods or "good whiles?" What does she mean by referring to Genesis as the work of Moses, in utter disregard of the fact that it contains numerous references, in the past tense, to events hundreds of years later than Moses, and that, as Greg says, the only way in which we can assume that Moses wrote the Pentateuch is to throw out as interpolations all the passages which prove conclusivly that he did not write it? Even Smith (Bible Dictionary, article Pentateuch) admits that,

> As regards any direct and unimpeachable testimony to the composition of the whole work by Moses, we hav it not. Only one book out of the five—Deuteronomy—claims in express terms to be from his hand. And yet, strange to say, this is the very book in which modern criticism refuses most peremptorily to admit the claim.

In regard to Bible chronology, the writer of the article Chronology, in the new edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, says:

> The chronological elements on which both Jews and Christians found their computations for determining this period (the creation of man) were derived from the Old Testament narrativs, which hav been transmitted to us through three different channels. These are the Hebrew scriptures, the Samaritan text, and the Greek text, known as the Septuagint. In respect to chronology the three accounts are totally irreconcilable with each other, and no conclusiv reason can be given for preferring any one of them to another. We hav no concurrent testimony with which to compare them; nor is it even known which of them was regarded as the most probable by the Jews themselvs when the books of the Old Testament were revised or transcribed by Ezra. The ordinary rules of probability cannot be ascribed to a state of things in which the duration of human life is represented as extending to nearly a thousand years.

And yet on the strength of these absurd, contradictory, anonymous, legendary, and mythical stories (if we believe the Bible) we must believe that the writer of another anonymous compilation ascribed to Luke was able to trace the ancestry of an obscure carpenter of Nazareth, without missing a link, clear back to the first man; a man who was not born, but made out of dust by an imaginary being called God. And we are to believe this in spite of the archeological evidence which proves that man has existed on this earth for at least hundreds of thousands of years; and notwithstanding the two genealogies of the gospels hav furnished Joseph with two distinct and mutually exclusiv sets of ancestors, leaving us to infer that if there had been more inspired genealogists he would hav been supplied with more sets of ancestors.

Mrs. Ritchey wants a solution of this conundrum: "Why should an unintelligent nature decree that, whereas the law is everywhere else universal, cold contracts and heat expands, in water this law should be reversed, and cold be made to expand?"

Who believes that unintelligent nature decrees? It is not a decree unless the theory of creation—the making of something out of nothing—is true. In what imaginable way would a decree affect the contraction or expansion of substances? But is it a fact? Water at 32° Far. is as cold as ice at 32°. When water crystallizes into ice it expands. So it is not reduction of temperature, but crystallization, which causes it to occupy more space.

Chemically, water is the result of the union of oxygen and hydrogen. The ultimate particles of oxygen and hydrogen may be large enough so that if a minute drop of water were magnified to the size of this earth the former might be as large as plums, and the latter the size of peas. Now, if there is any design in the matter, it must relate to each of these ultimate particles. On the theory of creation, God must hav made each of these particles by carrying out his design in its shape, and manifesting his skill in constructing it accurately. And this design and skill, we understand, go back of the very existence of these particles and start at nothing. On the supposition of design in the formation of elemental substances, nothing is the raw material out of which the universe was created. But, as Ingersoll says: "Nothing considered as a raw material is a failure." Think of the ultimate particles of all the elements composing the universe!

But the design argument must not be permitted to stop here just as it was going to solve the problem of existence. Who made this wonderful God? Who provided him with his marvelous attributes? How came he to be of the male gender? Was there no design in that, or did it just happen, or is it wicked to ask such questions? If he could exist forever without any creator and without a beginning, why not the universe?

The fact is that the forces of nature are uniform in their operation, and there is nothing but myth and fable to support the notion that any God ever did, or could, interfere with that uniformity.

Does Mrs. Ritchey accept the proposition that "like produces like?" If she believes the Bible, she believes that the whole human race descended from Noah. Noah died two years before the birth of Abraham, and Shem not till about the time of the birth of Jacob and Esau. When Abraham went down into Egypt he found an organized government with a differentiated language. At that time there were negroes in Egypt from Ethiopia, and all the racial distinctions were essentially what they are now, and all descended from Noah during his own lifetime. So competent a comparativ anatomist as Agassiz declared that the so-called races of men were distinct species—so distinct that any theory which would account for the production of one from another would account equally well for the evolution of man from the anthropoid apes. All of this, according to the Bible, took place among the descendants of one man during his own lifetime. Mrs. Ritchey accepts this account, and still insists that "like produces like."

But the statement that "like produces like" is a statement which no scientist admits. All agree that processes which are now going on are sufficient to produce "varieties." But the distinction between varieties and species is indefinable. So far as small variations—which, when aggregated, account for evolution—are concerned, the uniform rule is, that like produces unlike.

Mrs. Ritchey has discovered a passage in a lecture of Professor Huxley's, written twenty-six years ago (only three years after the publication of Darwin's "Origin of Species"), which she imagins is unfavorable to the theory of evolution; but she has wholly mistaken the meaning of the sentence quoted. If she had carefully noted the numerous ifs which it contained, she would hav seen that there was nothing left excepting the fact that the geological record is very imperfect. Mr. Huxley did not then believe that the earliest fossiliferous rocks then known were coeval with the commencement of life; now he knows they were not. He did not believe that their contents gave a just conception of the earliest flora and fauna, because they were not the earliest. He did not believe in a process of necessary progressiv development, because retrogression is a conspicuous fact. He did not believe the time was entirely comprised in that represented by the fossiliferous rocks, because we hav not got the entire series, but hav only fragments.

I will notice one more of Mrs. Ritchey's statements, the correction of which involves a demonstration of the theory of evolution, and quit. It is this: "Science teaches us that, instead of different species being introduced by small and weak beginnings, and with dimly defined and confused distinctions of species, the giants came first, and the distinctions were as clear and defined then as now."

I cannot answer that better than by quoting a few brief sentences from a work entitled, "Geological Studies," by Alexander Winchell, professor of geology and paleontology in the University of Michigan (1886). Every statement which these sentences contain is supported by facts, and is sufficient to show that Mrs. Ritchey's statements are the exact reverse of the truth. These sentences are taken from pages 334 to 356:

It will be remarked that ancient fishes possessed in some respects an embryonic character. . . . The correspondence between the embryos of modern types and the adults of ancient types is a general principle in the history of life.

The limb characters, like the general features of the ichtheosaurus, point clearly to a close relationship with pre-existent fishes. The thoughtful biologist cannot avoid the question how such affinities came to exist.

The air had its reptils—pterosauria, flying saurians—having essentially the structural characteristics of reptils, with some bird-like modifications.

One of the earliest forms of birds was the Archæopteryx Mocroura. . . . It has a conspicuously long vertebrated tail, quill-bearing on each side, and Marsh has just shown that it possessed teeth. Whether more bird than reptil, is still a mooted point.

With few exceptions, the Mesozoic mammals are low generalized forms, not a few of them possessing features which point more directly to the insectivoras. From this order true marsupials and insectivoras are probably derived.

In the oldest Eocene deposits in New Mexico are found the remains of a horse-like quadruped, the eohippus, about the size of a fox. It had four functional toes before and three behind. A rudiment (like a "splint bone") remained of the outer or fifth toe. In the middle Eocene of Wyoming existed the orohippus, also the size of a fox. This had four functional toes before and three behind. Later in the Eocene lived the epihippus, which resembled the orohippus in the digits, but differed in its more developed molars.

In the early Miocene lived the mesohippus, a horse-like quadruped of the size of a sheep. Its functional toes had diminished to three before and three behind. In the fore-limb was a large "splint," a remnant of the fifth toe.

In the late Miocene, of Oregon, existed the miohippus, also of the size of a sheep, with three functional toes before and three behind, with the splint of the fifth digit before, but smaller than in the mesohippus. The middle hoof also larger, and the lateral hoofs shrunken.

Coming down to the earlier Pliocene, we find that a horse-like quadruped existed called the protohippus, of the size of an ass. Instead of three serviceable toes it had one, with a dangling hooflet or "dewclaw" on each side.

Next, in the middle Pliocene, existed pliohippus, of the proportions of a moderate-sized horse, in which was only a middle toe, larger than in the protohippus, and with larger splints instead of the dangling hooflets on each side.

Finally, toward the end of the Pliocene, equus, or modern horse, existed in America. It differed from protohippus in a more powerful middle digit, diminished splint bones, and upper molars larger.

Every part and organ of the horse came to be what it is by the same process of minute differentiation. The evolution of the camel, the deer, and other quadrupeds has been traced with almost equal minuteness. Everything that exists came to be what it is by a process of change—evolution.

No one with his eyes open can go amiss for examples of evolution; but creation is a theory unsupported by any fact. I can show Mrs. Ritchey plenty of animals that grew. Let her kindly show me one that was created, and she will hav a basis for her theory. Does not Mrs. Ritchey know that when a physiologist finds the merest fragment of a bone, that fragment implies a whole bone, and that bone a whole skeleton of correlated bones, and these a system of muscles and nerves, and these imply growth and an ancestry. Inferences of this kind are supported by all the facts of the organic world, and when Mrs. Ritchey refuses to consider them, and assumes that the oldest traces of life which hav been found are the oldest that existed, she is simply assuming that our museums contain the bones of all the vertebrates that hav existed on this earth. If her position is correct, she should be able to find all the skeletons of her own ancestors back to the one that was not evoluted but made.

"That grand, noble old man" was probably very kind and patient, but he evidently was ignorant of paleontology, or Mrs. Ritchey was not an apt pupil.

Some More Slate-Writing.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A few days after the slate-writing performance described by my husband (THE TRUTH SEEKER, May 12th) I went to see what I could get with the same slates. Before going I wrote questions on five slips of paper, addressed to my father, mother, sister, uncle, and niece, all deceased. I asked Mr. Keeler if these prepared papers would do. "Yes," he said, "provided you hav put in the surnames." Not having done that, I unfolded the papers while his back was turned from me and wrote in all the surnames. He certainly could not hav seen any of my writing, nor did I at any time giv him the slightest clue to the names or anything. I had written. Nor did Mr. Keeler know me, though I had seen him twice, on the preceding two Sunday evenings, giving tests to a large audience after the lecture at the Spiritual Hall. And by the way, out of more than twenty tests given on those two evenings, not more than one or two appeared to be unsuccessful; that is to say, all but one or two were responded to by different persons and admitted to be satisfactory.

My aunt accompanied me to Mr. Keeler's house. She remained at first in the parlor, while I entered his sitting-room back of the parlor. My strongest desire was to get a communication from my mother. No sooner had I set down than Mr. Keeler became agitated and turned pale. He said he saw and felt something which he could not understand, but perhaps I could. He was loth to tell what it was, but I wished him to do so; and I will only say that the manifestation, as he gave it, was such as to convince me that some unseen intelligence, purporting to be the spirit of my mother, was responding to my thoughts and answering my questions.

Presently he said, "I see a big letter H over your head, and by the side of it another H; but the latter one is still in the body." Harriet was my mother's name, and Harriet, one of my elder sisters, is living with me.

Mr. Keeler then told me to call in my friend, so I tapped on the folding door as a signal for my aunt to come in, but all the time I watched the slates on the table. As my aunt entered Mr. Keeler smilingly addressed her by name, "Sarah," and presently, turning to me, said, "Uncle Charles." And then he gave the full name of my aunt's deceased husband.

Seating himself at the table, Mr. Keeler took one of the slates and wrote a line or two on it, but immediately rubbed it off. The other he did not touch at all. Then he gave us a bit of slate-pencil not larger than a kernel of rye to hold a few moments in our hands. This bit of pencil I myself put between the slates, and I myself tied the slates together with my handkerchief. There was certainly no writing on them then, nor did Mr. Keeler help tie or handle them.

Prior to the tying Mr. Keeler said that his spirit guide, perceiving that most of my prepared papers were addressed to females, requested that I should add two or three addressed to male friends. And Mr. Keeler himself wrote on a slip of paper: "George Christy, come now. Kr." This, and all the other papers I now hav, were all folded up tightly and mingled together on the table. At Mr. Keeler's request I took up one of them, which from its external appearance I supposed to be the one addressed to my mother, and held it a little while.

Then the slates were held by Mr. Keeler, myself, and my aunt—six hands upon them at once, and I put my ear close to the slates to hear the sounds. I could hear the bit of pencil moving from side to side. I could hear it as it returned and began another line. I could hear the dotting of the i's and the crossing of the t's. And I heard the taps indicating the completion of a message.

When the slates were untied one of them contained four messages, each one in a very different handwriting, and the bit of pencil was not there. Apparently it had been all used up in writing the messages.

Three of the four messages were in answer to three of the five questions written out by me before coming to see Mr. Keeler. My mother, my father, and my niece each addressed me appropriately, just as if they were living. They all signed their full names, and the handwriting was apparently theirs. My mother not only answered my questions, but gave the Christian name of my husband. My father named his living son, and spoke of his son's boy who was born five years after my father's death. My niece named her living brother.

The fourth message was this, in large letters: "Good morning. Tell Sarah. Wallace Mentor." No such person is known to any of us. If by "Sarah" was meant my aunt, she herself was present.

Again the slates were put together, but not tied, because I feared that might mar the writing already done. This time Mr. Keeler put in the bit of pencil, and the slates, as before, were held by all three of us, with the already-written messages on the top before our eyes. Again I heard the sound of writing, and in due time the second slate was filled with a message from my uncle, addressed both to my aunt and myself, and signed with his full name. And as before, there was no bit of pencil left.

From my deceased sister I got no answer in writing, but Mr. Keeler gave me the name by which we used to call her, "Caddy," for Caroline. And there was no answer at all from the three other persons to whom I wrote in the presence of Mr. Keeler.

During all this performance Mr. Keeler kept up constant talking, repeating some of the names and giving the substance of the answers that afterward appeared on the slates, and always without mistake.

This is the only slate-writing performance I ever saw. I went determined to discover any possible fraud. I had my senses all the time; I saw every movement in the broad daylight, and I affirm most positivly that there was no deception on the part of Mr. Keeler; he never could hav produced that slate-writing. Why Do Christians Abuse Liberal, Mo.?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: One would suppose, from pulpit professions, that Christians would commend goodness, "good fruits," wherever found. But do they? Do they respect, reverence, an Infidel who is known to be a good man? Or do they not hate the good man because he is an Infidel? Is it not the same with Liberal, Mo.?

The other day I received a letter from my old-time friend, Stephen Decker, Pleasanton, Kan., one of the most level-headed and progressiv merchants of that live Liberal state. Here are golden sentences:

I hav been to Liberal, Mo., where there is no Christ, no God, no Holy Ghost, no Sunday-school, and no Christians.

I must say in behalf of Liberal that I never met a better and more intelligent class of people in my life. The young people are better informed in a general way, as a class, than the young people of any other town that I am acquainted with. They hav excellent schools, and try to excel the young people of other towns in every way.

There is a picture, given by a business man who has traveled across the continent, in which all Liberals in America can feel just pride Contrast it with Christian calumny!

As soon as I can afford the cost we will hav our ten-year-old boy—our youngest—go to Liberal, Mo., away from Christian influence as far as possible, and obtain the benefits of Liberal schools, and finally graduate at Liberal College.

I fear we Liberals hav nearly all been a little too lukewarm concerning that commendable effort at Liberal. The dissensions there hav affected us more than the Liberality. Friend Decker's letter, although not intended for publication, givs us a clearer apprehension of the clear atmosphere of that progressiv town than anything I ever read, even their own papers; a peep into the daily life of Liberal, with which no Christian town can compare.

Is Professor Leahy Persecuted?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: We now hav for president of the board of trustees of the only Freethought University in the world the Hon. B. A. Bigelow. In his eloquent address to the board he said: "We don't want any more Ingersolls, Websters, or Paines. We don't want our sons taught to be great orators; we want some one to teach them to plow. They're the ones that get there. You might teach them manners for a hundred years, and they would be no better off."

Mr. Bigelow is quite right; we do need some one (and we've got him) to teach our boys to "plow"—not to till the soil, but to "plow" the minds of the coming generations. One thing sure, Mr. Bigelow need not fear that his boys will ever become Ingersolls.

Another of our leading Liberals (G. H. Walser) said: "The fact that students love their teacher is no proof that he is a good teacher; in fact, it goes to show that he is a bad teacher."

It is universally known that the students all love Professor Leahy, and most of them declare that if another teacher is put in his place they will not attend school. Why the people will persecute him is unaccountable. One thing is sure: the day that Professor Leahy is removed from the University, that day it dies; and that day the town of Liberal will begin to go, and keep going down, till at last it will be what all Christians would hav it, an orthodox town. Liberals, must the Freethought University die? ANONYMOUS.

Matthew Arnold.

So Matthew Arnold, a poet with deep and tender insight into the poetic sympathies of the universe, has passed away. Those who can breathe in the higher levels of spiritual exhilaration hav lost the most exqusit lyre that has sounded among the sons of men since the waters of Spezzia closed with their dirge-wail over the remains of Shelley. To this we bear willing testimony, although Arnold was no bard of ours. He had too little in him of the Byron he depreciated, and whom we adore. It was Arnold who, in magnificent because truthful imagery, represented Byron as bearing "from Europe to the Ætolian shore, the pageant of his bleeding heart." But of Arnold himself it can be predicated only that he drove down the neatly graveled pathway of modern letters the gilded landau of literary dandyism.

Are we reminded that Matthew Arnold was a skeptic? Then we remind the reminder that skepticism of the vaguely expressed and mentally inconsequent Arnold type hinders rather than facilitates the dawning of the better day. God-abrogating phrase-mongering about the "stream of tendency not Ourselvs which maketh for Righteousness," allied with the political maintenance of the Church of England, is too paradoxical a type of skepticism ever to blossom into practical effect, or to animate the public conscience with any impulse beyond that of trying to reconcile irreconcilable propositions, and to ravel metaphysical conundrums.—Secular Review.

For Pounding Their Pastor.

As murders and similar mirth-provoking matters are a glut in the news-market of this modern Gomorrah, and as it is as yet an unusual Sunday-morning diversion for leading members of a Christian congregation to pull their pastor out of his pulpit and, by way of further showing their admiration, administer to him a severe threshing, even the filing of the petition in the circuit court amounted to almost a sensation. Not that a little corporeal disciplin isn't frequently deserved by the preachers, but as the law of compensation is generally out of joint, we being more liable to get what we don't deserve, and deserve many good things we don't get, I fear for myself.

The writer is at present officiating in a church, where a pulpit used to be, and he approaches this subject with fear, trembling, and hope that this sort of sociability may not become vulgarly common—at least, that the contagion of its example may not strike the members of the Chicago Secular Union as particularly deserving of emulation.

In his petition, Rev. Leonard C. Koehler, pastor of St. Stephen's (we hav a family affection for this saint, even though he doesn't spell his name right), relates how the church, and its other property, valued at $15,000, became involved, was foreclosed, and finally repurchased with funds raised by the pastor of the German Reformed church—which proves that, if he is not a reformer to any great extent, he is a "hustler" for filthy lucre. The $20,000 he secured from contributions was soon placed at the disposal of twelve of the wealthiest members of his church, who formed a trust. Crowds flocked to hear him, but, as usual, with success came dissension—there cropped out between the pastor and his wealthy trust (whose names I fear to trust to your compositors) a decided difference of opinion. But the twelve apostles stood so well together that they hav held the offices continuously for six years. This clique concluded that they could not "trust" the pastor, so they conspired to dismiss him.

Koehler was not that kind, and the matter was settled in his favor by a vote of his congregation and he concluded the war was over. There is where he counted without his host. We are told that Sunday morning, June 6, 1886, broke calm and clear. No spots were visible on the sun to giv rise to suspicion of treachery. The robins sang merrily their lay, and the lake breeze broze just sufficient to lull the pastor's aspirations into an angelic frame of mind as he journeyed toward the house of God. He felt at peace with all mankind and vainly thought that all mankind was at peace with him, as he blissfully stepped into his pulpit to dispense glad tidings to his people that bright Sabbath morn. Alas! how could they do it? they ought to know they'd rue it. To be brief, rudely awakened from his reverie of loving kindness, and by the hands of the arch conspirators of the trust, this man of God was, in the language of the petition, "actually seized by Hafer, Scheidig, and others, while in the pulpit, and wickedly, unlawfully, violently, maliciously, and brutally dragged down and cruelly beaten." Mein Gott in himmell! Can such things be? Must pause to let my indignation evaporate—while taking a Teuton's consolation. To resume the thread of this painful discourse, Rev. Leonard C. Koehler left his pastorate; which was very considerate and commendable, although a rather tardy recognition of an ugly fact—they did not want him. One thing, however, sits heavily on the stomach of the deposed pastor. It is that the self-same "trust" has remained in office ever since, despite that one hundred members of the congregation, as he claims, hav seceded and are drawing in their spiritual consolation from Brother Koehler in Grace church. Moreover, the good pastor avers that the "trust" hav not paid their debts, but, instead, hav spent the money in riotous living for themselvs, and for this he demands an accounting from the time he left the church, and that the money raised by him and wrongfully used be returned; and that, if the court admits the justice of his claim, the money owed him be a lien on the property.

From the lovely Santa Clara valley resound echoes of President Putnam's grand labors for universal mental liberty, and San José marshals another gallant host under the banner of the American Secular Union in response to his rousing lecture on "Dangers Ahead." He is the only Richmond in the field, the only one who, in the West, works everywhere for something more than himself—the cause. From Mrs. R. H. Schwartz, the secretary of the new organization, we hav received a charter fee, and the document is forwarded. May the Secularists of San José wage relentless war against orthodox tyranny, unjust taxation, and ever maintain "privileges for none, justice for all." Those who believe in the Nine Demands, who realize there is something for every Freethinker to do, should bend their energies to make President Putnam's tour, commencing June 3d, one continuous triumphal march over Oregon's mountains and fertil valleys, following the Cascade range to the Olympian hights and beautiful bays of fair Washington territory, through Idaho, Utah, Colorado, Nebraska, and Iowa, till we shake the sturdy Secular soldier's hand in the city of Chicago, where hosts of friends realize the labor he performs purely for the principles he espouses. If there is a date unfilled, or an appointment that can yet be made in addition to those herewith announced, do not fail to write him immediately.

Those who are anticipating a visit from the poet, philosopher, and orator of the American Secular Union, who is performing heroic work for the present and future, should see to it that his reception is commensurate with his labors and his worth.

Saturday the Cook county Sunday-school convention closed its session in Farwell Hall. The proceedings would fill THE TRUTH SEEKER, but the secretary's report shows that in this county there are 568 evangelical Sunday-schools, conducted by 11,085 officers, representing 17 denominations, with an attendance of 117.565; the average attendance for the year being 88,817, and the increase over last year 6,994. This influence Secularists, to be successful, must counteract. When will they begin? The Sunday-school literature is so insipid that it helps to make young skeptics, as the Boston Courier's poet portrays as follows:

I never hav met,
Yet I cannot forget,
Where'er I may wander, where'er I may be,
The minister's joy,
That dear little boy,
My teachers described as a pattern for me.
I've searched for him oft,
Alow and aloft,
In desert and forest, and cranny and nook,
But never hav met,
Yet I cannot forget,
The good little boy of the Sunday-school book.

A new license ordinance has just been defeated by the city council by a vote of 37 to 17. It provided that no saloon should be located within two hundred feet of any church or parochial school or any other school having an attendance of fifty students; that in residence blocks the written permission of owners of a majority of the frontage on both sides of the street should accompany the petition for license. Tuesday evening the council chamber was packed with a peculiar mixture of interested parties—saloonists and ministers. After a long debate, the saloonists knocked out the ministers. As our proxy mayor, Roche, was run in on the cry of reform, and as he presides over the council and gave decisions favorable to the saloonists, Rev. Drs. Little and Withrow are gnashing their teeth over his treachery. The daily Noosé sings him this stanza:

There was a blond party named Roche,
Who posed as sans peur, sans reproche,
But this modern Bayard
Made the preachers all tired
By his aid of saloons—and of Roche.

A Freethought Congress in Africa.

From the National Reformer.

This Freethought, or as our French neighbors prefer to call it, Anticlerical, Congress was held at Oran, Algeria, on the 29th, 30th, and 31st of March last. The sittings were opened at a quarter past 9 on Thursday, the 30th, at the town hall, by an address from M. Eugène Péllissier, vice-president of the Libre Pensée d'Oran, who, after welcoming the assembled delegates, uttered a powerful denunciation of the church.

At the conclusion of M. Pélissier's speech, officers were elected and the delegations were verified. The following societies were represented either by their own delegates or by some member of the Oran society:

The Socialistic Freethought Societies of the 20th and 4th arrondissements of Paris.

The formalities of verification over, committees were appointed to examin the items placed upon the program. It fell to the first committee to discuss "The necessity of independence in the relations between the state and religions;" to the second, "The influence which the separation of church and state would exercise upon national customs, and upon social and political economy," and to the third, "The serious consequences of celibacy in the religious brotherhoods, and the indispensability of the suppression of convents and the religious orders of men and women." The fourth committee were allotted three points: (1) The general and absolute prohibition of all religious manifestations or signs at weddings, funerals, processions, etc. (2) The suppression of bells. (3) The obligation of imposing upon municipalities the duty of removing from schools all religious emblems and of placing republican ones instead.

On the following day M. Bertuy, on behalf of the first committee, made an eloquent speech in favor of the complete separation of church and state, and M. Vincent, also on behalf of the committee, proposed resolutions to the Congress to that effect. The second committee not then having concluded its labors, the report of the third committee was given by M. Francisco Fernandez, who spoke in Spanish. After his speech had been translated into French, resolutions were passed inviting agitation against celibate societies. On the report of the fourth committee a little discussion on detail ensued, but agitation for the suppression of religious emblems on ceremonial occasions and in schools, and for the suppression of bells, was agreed upon.

When the Congress met on the next day, the 31st of March, the second committee presented three reports on the subject it had been their duty to consider, viz., "The influence which the separation of church and state would exercise upon national customs, and upon social and political economy." The speakers were M. Py, M. Eduarté, and M. Griffon. The report of the last seems to hav been specially elaborate. Each report concluded by asking for the immediate abolition of the Concordat. The reports and conclusions were approved; a little formal business, such as fixing the next Congress to take place at Algiers, was disposed of, and then the Congress was thrown open to any who wished to speak. Several deputies availed themselvs of the opportunity, and then the president, M. Arnould, closed what was manifestly a most interesting and successful Congress.

Pretended Descriptions of Jesus Christ.

LETTER OF PUBLIUS LENTULUS.

Geronimo Xavier, a Jesuit missionary, who died in 1617, was the probable fabricator of the following document, first found in his "History of Christ," written in Persic:

Lentulus, Prefect of Jerusalem, to the Senate and People of Rome greeting:

At this time there hath appeared, and still livs, a man endowed with great powers, whose name is Jesus Christ. Men say that he is a mighty prophet; his disciples call him the son of God. He restores the dead to life, and heals the sick from all sorts of ailments and diseases. He is a man of stature, proportionably tall, and his cast of countenance has a certain severity in it, so full of effect as to induce beholders to love, and still to fear him. His hair is of the color of wine, as far as the bottom of his ears, without radiation and straight; and from the lower part of his ears it is curled, down to his shoulders, and bright, and hangs downward from his shoulders. At the top of his head it is parted after the fashion of the Nazarines. His forehead is smooth and clean, and his face without a pimple, adorned by a certain temperate redness; his countenance gentleman-like and agreeable; his nose and mouth nothing amiss; his beard thick and divided into two branches, of the same color as his hair, his eyes blue, and uncommonly bright. In reproving and rebuking he is formidable, in teaching and exhorting, of a bland agreeable tongue. He has a wonderful grace of person united with seriousness. No one hath ever seen him smile, but weeping they hav. He hath a lengthened stature of body; his hands are straight and turned up; his arms are delectable; in speaking, deliberate and slow, and sparing of his conversation—the most beautiful countenance among the sons of men.

In front of certain manuscripts of the gospels, written in 1504 and preserved in the library at Jena, there is the following later inscription in Latin:

In the time of Octavius Cæsar, Publius Lentulus, proconsul in the parts of Judea and (the territory) of Herod the king, is said to hav written this epistle to the Roman senators, which was afterward found by Eutropius in the annals of the Romans.

Eutropius is manifestly one of the numerous Benedictine forgeries. The epistle of Publius Lentulus, which follows, begins, In hoc tempore—"At this time"—that is, in the time of Octavius (Augustus) Cæsar, who died A.D. 14, when the mythical Jesus was a beardless boy, and the real Jesus, the illegiti mate son of Mary by Joseph Pandera, had been dead more than eighty years.

Pontius Pilate had no predecessor named Publius Lentulus, nor was there ever a proconsul in Judea of that name. This fabricated letter has served its purpose, and is now in a state of "innocuous desuetude." But its description of Jesus Christ is retained in the recent forgery of Pilate's letter to Tiberius Cæsar, for example: "His golden-colored hair and beard gave to his appearance a celestial aspect. Never hav I seen a sweeter or more serene countenance." (See THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 28th.)

All our pictures of Jesus are after the same model. The Catholic church could not afford to accept Isaiah's prophetic description of the messiah—"His visage was so marred more than any man, and his form more than the sons of men." And having not a scrap of pagan or Jewish testimony to the fact of a Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate, the church has palmed off such clumsy forgeries as these upon its ignorant and credulous dupes.

This assertion is more than confirmed by the learned Jesuit Hardouin, who in his posthumous book, published in 1766, maintains that there is no genuin primitiv church literature—that it is all fabricated by Benedictine monks since the middle of the thirteenth century, and that nearly all the Greek and Latin classics are of like modern origin.

ANTICHRIST.

Mr. Gladstone's Essay Dissected.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It may be presumptuous for one of my caliber to attempt anticipating the reply which Ingersoll will undoubtedly make to Gladstone, but amidst the bray of jubilation which the poor dear Christians will raise during the month, the crude thoughts of ordinary Infidels may hav the charitable effect of letting them down easy. Mr. Gladstone is without doubt the ablest opponent that Ingersoll has ever been called upon to meet—the most learned, the most skilled in debate, the most courteous, and the most celebrated. It is encouraging, therefore, to find his criticism marked all over by that sure sign of weakness, an apologetic tone. His article is not really a vindication of Christianity at all. It is only an arraignment of Ingersoll's logic and rhetoric. Those well-worn fallacies, the ignoratio eleuctii and the argument ad verecundum, so familiar to the hand of the polemic, but so odious to the ear of the logician, make up the larger part of it. Thus, more than six pages are given to pricking holes in less than four lines of Ingersoll's, which compare the human sacrifices of the Hindoos with those mentioned in the Bible. And what does all this labor amount to, in the most favorable point of view? A demonstration that it is hasty to assume that the human sacrifices offered by Jephthah and Abraham are as such approved by Christians. I submit that Ingersoll did not say they were. I submit that it would be quite as easy to dispute the proposition that suttee or that infanticide is sanctioned by the Veda; and that Christian writers hav actually disputed them with quite as much success. The comparison, then, appears to remain legitimate. Human sacrifice is among the deplorable results of superstition in India. So it was in Gilead—and at Pocasset. The Christian pot is not justified in reviling the Hindoo kettle for blackness; which Dr. Field had been doing; and that is all Ingersoll meant to say. But if he had accused the Bible of formally sanctioning such acts as Jephthah's, how poor an excuse it would be to show that there might be a question about it! Does the proof that suttee is not mentioned in the Veda amount to proof that the system founded on the Veda is not tainted with the atrocities of suttee? Those who maintain a different system do not think so. Why is not their argument against one form of superstition as good in the mouth of the Agnostic against any? In another place seven more pages are given to criticising some not very original remarks of Ingersoll to the effect that error is innocent because conviction is not in the power of the will. Mr. Gladstone here is venturing upon rather dangerous ground. The whole question of the will's relation to the judgment was thoroughly threshed out some centuries ago by the schools of Duns Scotus and Thomas Aquinas, with the result of getting the church into a dilemma from which a greater than either of them must come to extricate her. Either faith requires an act of the will or it does not. If it does, then orthodoxy lacks that demonstration of truth or probability which convinces in spite of the will. If it does not, then it has no moral quality either good or bad.

Of the remaining fifteen pages about seven are devoted to criticisms of Ingersoll as little to the main purpose as the above, leaving only eight in all for Mr. Gladstone's direct defense of Christianity. Mr. Gladstone is too sagacious a polemic to imitate what may be considered the fault of his opponent. He has charged Ingersoll with exaggeration, haste, dogmatism, a profusion of mere rhetorical invectiv, the justice of all which accusations is considerably lessened by the fact that Ingersoll was writing as an advocate against a system itself essentially dogmatic, and was not, therefore, required by the laws of debate to prove, but only to raise objections. But Mr. Gladstone has taken care that his indictment shall not be retorted. Nothing can be milder than his way of insinuating that there may be something in Christianity after all. A minute critic upon the careful structure of his argument might perhaps find some such intimation in almost every passage directed against Ingersoll. But there are only three in which Christianity appears to be prominent and Ingersoll secondary. Colonel Ingersoll had said that the discoveries of Darwin "carried to their legitimate conclusion destroy the creeds and sacred scriptures of mankind." Mr. Gladstone asks, why? and in endeavoring to show the contrary, draws a very proper distinction between Christianity and Theism. Availing myself of this distinction, I should say the question why Darwinism destroys a considerable part of the Christian scriptures is hardly worth answering. Sophistry has not yet attempted so hopeless a task as reconciling the statements that man was made out of the dust of the ground, and became sinful and mortal through disobediently eating an apple, with the idea that he was evolved from a previously existing animal form, bringing with him not only mortality but all the savage, greedy, and otherwise brutal instincts which constitute "original sin." With Theism in the widest and most indefinit sense, Darwinism is perhaps not inconsistent. But it is inconsistent with two fundamental ideas of the current Theism, the idea of absolute creation and the idea of intelligent design. Current Theism teaches that matter was made out of nothing. Darwinism, together with all scientific discovery, discredits the idea that anything is made out of nothing. The definit demiurgic act of six thousand years ago is superseded by a process of change which every enlargement of our knowledge givs us better reason for believing to extend from eternity to eternity. And that adaptation of organs to functions upon which the argument from design is built disappears with the design itself, when we learn that the functions precede the organs and are the cause of their existence. The difference between the first two conceptions cannot be minimized into what Mr. Gladstone calls a quantitativ difference. It is qualitativ and insuperable. The difference between the other two cannot be disposed of, as he seeks to dispose of it, by a reference to the necessity for a first cause. It consists in the disappearance of supposed final causes and the establishment of an automatic efficient cause. The idea that God made mice to escape cats and cats to catch mice—an idea sufficiently incongruous in the first place—gets beyond the limits of rational consideration when the cat's claws, eyes, "whiskers," etc., are shown to hav acquired their high mouse-catching quality through the exercise of the cat's own propensities, reinforced by the natural elimination of those specimens in which the advantageous peculiarities were least pronounced; while the quick ear, sharp eye, swift legs, and timid heart of the mouse acquired their cat-escaping powers in the same manner.

In answer to Ingersoll's arraignment of the conventional idea that God allows the wicked (very unnecessarily) to triumph in this life, and then punishes them with unreasonable severity in another, Mr. Gladstone's reply amounts to this, that the righteous, on the whole, hav the best of this life; and his principal case in point is that Christendom now rules the world, through a surplus, he is candid enough to add, of material, as well as moral, force. The illustration furnishes ground for some reflections not altogether cheerful. When Christianity beyond question meant reform, it did not rule the world to any alarming extent. Since the time of Constantine, we may fairly doubt if it has meant reform. Very similar observations might be applied to most other ideas which hav passed from the stage of movement into that of institution. The sad and cynical truth would seem to be about this: Mankind is divisible into knaves, fools, and "cranks," the latter genus including the whole species reformer. Between the knave and fool there is the same happy interaction as between hammer and anvil; but woe betide the "crank" who presumes to get into the intervening space! It is at the expense of his own person that he prevents knave from hammering fool; and it is to little purpose, for knave forthwith moves somewhere else, and fool obediently follows. Thus, as the author of "Ecce Homo" has well said, the latter part of the "crank's" destiny is worse than the first. Could he return to earth, he would find the very class of people who crucified him making his tomb the shrine of a new idolatry, as absurd and pernicious as that which he destroyed, and the chisels and files with which he cut his way out of prison forged into the bolts and bars of a new prison which is called by his own name. He has, indeed, the satisfaction of knowing that he has done his duty; but to affiliate this reward on divine justice it should be eternal, and that appears to involve—on Christian principles it certainly does include—a revolting consequence, even the eternal damnation of those who made his work necessary, repaid him for it by martyrdom, and finally spoiled it by reproducing the old wrong in a new form.

The third point at which Mr. Gladstone attempts to vindicate orthodoxy, is the absence in the much-lauded gospel of any practical moral principle, such as that slavery, or polygamy, or despotism is wrong. The defense is a conventional one. Jesus did not introduce a system, but a spirit, which is the life of the society he founded, and the source of living morality. All this would be a good deal more satisfactory if it were accompanied by some proof that this spirit has the practical effect of making Christians unanimous on any great point of ethics. It is easy to prove from the "Memorabilia" of Xenophon that Socrates laid down, though not in very finished shape, the method which all subsequent logic and science has pursued. It is easy, for a much more modern instance, to show that Saint Simon, in his conversations and his little pamphlets, laid down the common ideas of all modern Socialism. But the discovery of Jesus, as the author of "Ecce Homo" again says, is himself; and when we find his authority claimed by the advocates of every conceivable social system, from the Mormons to the Shakers, from the slaveowners to the Anarchists, is there not reason to say that the only peculiarity which his followers hav in common is the excessiv egotism implied in identifying one's own notions with a supposed command from heaven? That this doctrin of absolute unselfishness is a mere oriental platitude; and that its application is anything or nothing, according to the customs of the country and the conceptions of the individual.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE antagonist selected by the Christians of Phœnix, Ariz., to meet C. B. Reynolds in debate proved to be Clark Braden. Mr. Reynolds promptly and peremptorily declined to meet him. Mr. Reynolds was detained at San Diego, Cal., by the sinking at her wharf—just half an hour before she was to sail—of the steamship Queen of the Pacific.

J. E. REMSBURG recently lectured in three states, Indiana, Kentucky, and Ohio, within twenty-four hours. Mr. Remsburg will deliver three lectures at Sherman Opera House, Newark, N. Y., Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon and evening, May 26 and 27, 1888. Subjects: "False Claims," "Sabbath-Breaking," and "The Apostles of Liberty." All are cordially invited to attend, especially the clergy. Admission free. Front seats reserved for ladies, and gentlemen accompanied by ladies.

"To the Spiritualists and Liberals of Minnesota, and other states, greeting: The Rice County, Minn., Scientific, Moral, and Reformatory Association will hold their first annual meeting at Morristown, on the third Sunday in June, 1888, and in connection therewith will be held a Spiritual and Liberal camp-meeting, commencing Wednesday, June 13th, and closing on the Monday following. It being the first Spiritual and Liberal camp-meeting held in this state, we invite and earnestly solicit the attendance and aid of Spiritualists and Liberals of this and other states to help inaugurate and build up a permanent camp-meeting organization at this or some other suitable place in this locality. We also invite Spiritual and Liberal speakers and mediums; suitable rooms for holding séances will be furnished gratis. We wish to employ a good slate-writing medium, who will permit investigators to bring their own closed slates. Such a medium will be the instrument of great good to our cause, besides benefiting himself financially, as phenomena of this order hav never been witnessed or produced in this vicinity. We would ask such mediums to correspond with us at once, that we may make early and permanent arrangements for their coming. Ample means for board and shelter will be made for all who may attend the camp-meeting, at very reduced rates. The lowest reduction on railroad fare will be secured. Conveyance hourly between camp-ground and séance rooms, and to all trains, at a fare not to exceed five cents per trip. Further information can be obtained by corresponding with Mrs. Laura A. Grant, Morristown, Minn."

Colonel Ingersoll at the Nineteenth Century Club.

From the Herald of May 9th.

There was a genuin clash of intellectual arms at the Metropolitan Assembly Rooms last evening between the giants of reason and reasoning—Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Frederick R. Coudert, and Gen. Stewart L. Woodford. "The Limitations of Toleration" was the subject of discussion.

There was a large and fashionable audience present when President Courtlandt Palmer introduced Colonel Ingersoll. Mr. Palmer said that Colonel Ingersoll is to his time what Hugo, Voltaire, and Rousseau were to theirs.

The propositions made by Mr. Ingersoll were:

1. That thought is a necessary, natural product—the result of what is called impressions made through the medium of the senses upon the brain, not forgetting the fact of heredity.
2. That no human being is accountable to any being, human or divine, for his thoughts.
3. That human beings hav a certain interest in the thoughts of each other, and one who undertakes to tell his thoughts should be honest.
4. That all hav an equal right to express their thoughts upon all subjects.
5. That for one man to say to another, "I tolerate you," is an assumption of authority—not a disclaimer, but a waiver, of the right to persecute.
6. That each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world hav to express their thoughts to him.

Colonel Ingersoll wanted to know whether the will had any power over thought, and added that if thought is a necessity there follows no responsibility for it. In reading Shakspere one absorbs only in so far as the reader's soul has been developed. Civilization is advanced far enough to know now that the conduct of man is in no way responsible for the phenomena of nature. No man nor nation is wicked enough to bring down the wrath of heaven in bolts of lightning. That the thunderbolt is as likely to strike a good woman as a bad man, and that the ship loaded with pirates is quite as sure to ride out the storm as the vessel loaded with missionaries. And no man is happy who is not good.

"If your neighbor does a wrong thing," said the colonel, "your God can tend to him a thousand times better than you. He's got the time and the means. So you can afford to be tolerant. Now, then, I claim that in the realm of thought there is no democracy in which the majority rules. Do you think a good God would be satisfied with a compulsory worship? The rights of all are absolutely equal. The liberty of thought and the expression of it are of more value than anything else under the sun. Take that word liberty out of the human language and all other words are meaningless. Whoever has spoken against the right to speak has admitted that he denies his own doctrin. I hate that word "toleration." It was in vogue when the thinkers were in the minority, and when the great ignorant majority hated a heretic as a last year's leaf hates a this year's bud; at that time when the autocratic masses got tired of shedding blood and said, 'We'll tolerate you.' Your experience and mine shows that the bigger the man, the greater the heart, and the more excuses he will make for the frailties of humanity. Surely if there is an infinit being he is grander than any man. There is not a new truth that has not been anathematized, and not a step in progress that has not been opposed."

Speaking of the hereafter, Colonel Ingersoll said, pointing upward:

"When I get there I'll giv my honest opinion of that country. And if for that I lose my soul, I shall still possess my self-respect. I am defending your right to differ with me. No man can force my soul upon its knees unless the reason is given. I am going to act out my nature as I understand it. There is no one here who can think except as he must."

Colonel Ingersoll told a story with great effect of how a man wagered with a Methodist, promising to giv the best riding-horse in the county, that he could not say the Lord's Prayer without thinking of something else. The minister closed his eyes, he said, and when he got as far as "giv us this day" suddenly interrupted himself by exclaiming, "I suppose you'll throw in the saddle and bridle, too."

Mr. John D. Kernan had been announced to answer Colonel Ingersoll, but he did not appear, and Mr. Frederic R. Coudert took his place, with an apology for lack of preparation. Mr. Coudert is an orthodox Roman Catholic. He began mildly and waxed warm. He recalled Carlyle's comment upon a certain work as "a comic history of England," and said that he had just heard "a comic history of life." He could hardly believe that what had been said was pronounced in the presence of a nineteenth-century Christian audience, but rather that he was transported to an indissolient congregation of the twenty-third century. He bluntly took issue with Mr. Palmer on the comparison of Ingersoll to Voltaire, Hugo, and Rousseau, saying that these men had fought against wrongs, littleness, and fanaticism, and enriched the literature of the world. They were all men who had built up something.

"But what most ardent admirer will say that Colonel Ingersoll has built up anything?" vociferated Mr. Coudert. "Unfortunately," he added, "Freethought does exist. What man would not put fetters upon the demons of thought? Is it not unworthy of him to teach that thought must be free? Thought is unseen, unhandled, and untouched, and no despot has ever yet been able to fetter it. Is it not liberty of speech that he wants? Destruction, that is so pleasant, is what he aims at. The baby begins with destroying his bib, the older boy his hobby-horse, and the man joins the regiment with the latent instinct that he will hav the opportunity of destroying human life. The dynamiter says, I will giv you liberty to build if you will let me destroy. We hav been through many crises in our short history, and learned that thought is nothing before the law, while a word is an act. Who will say our society could exist if we allowed free speech. Whom would you punish for the murder of Desdemona? Iago's free speech poisoned Othello's mind, but he went scot-free. Is it charity for you to invade my home and teach my children that they are the witlings and fools of the world? Colonel Ingersoll's teaching is but a polite excuse for blasphemy, and by blasphemy I mean bringing into ridicule the things that are sacred—for instance, firing off the Lord's Prayer like a joke from Jo Miller. Christian faith is the ligament that has kept human society together. Think what you like, but do not as Samson did—pull down the temple upon your own head. Wherever liberty of speech has been incompatible with the safety of the state, the former has been compelled to fall back, and cannot be revived by nickel-plated platitudes and profane jokes disguised in purple and tinsel."

General Woodford represented the Protestant faith, and without preface attacked Colonel Ingersoll's logic. He said that Mr. Ingersoll's fatal error was in stating that thought is a necessary, natural product of effect upon the senses.

"Do you think that is thought?" asked he. "The senses make an impression upon your mind, but do not the will, the reason, and the memory take hold? Is thought not based on and assisted by secondary influences? He says no being is responsible to any other being, human or divine. Brandy suggests my thirst. Am I not held responsible as to whether I yield to the debauch or rise to the dignity of self-control? If we admit that there is no control of thought, then we lose the power of regenerating the world. If evil comes into your mind, you either harbor it or cast it out. I am responsible to my neighbor for helping him up or dragging him down. Because there is a creation I believe there is a creator, that if there is force there must be a projector, and that if there is matter there must be spirit."

General Woodford then concisely defined the Protestant doctrin of interpreting the Bible, and Colonel Ingersoll threw off his coat again and took the stand with fire in his eye. The manner of the contending gentlemen had been rather suggestiv of holding him up to an awful future. He said first that every mother wants to see her children soar to higher realms of thought than she had attained; that one cannot honor his father by going around and swearing to his mistakes.

"I hav done one thing," said Colonel Ingersoll grimly. "I hav compelled a Roman Catholic to compliment Voltaire, simply because it was at my expense. And as I think of him I see a plumed knight in mailed armor who rode on to the beleaguered city of Catholicity, who thrust the dagger of assassination into the mother church, making a wound from which she will never recover. The gentleman, too, judging from his talk, has preserved his bib. (Uproarious laughter.) I would be honest at the cradle. The child's brain now is a bastile and its poor little soul a convict. And now for the second gentleman. He is the Protestant who says you may think, but if you draw a wrong conclusion you are lost. Could you help believing the Bible? The Jonah story looks reasonable in Brooklyn [General Woodford's home]. I believe you are responsible to any person you injure. You can't injure an infinit being. All our duties are right here. Giv to every other human being the right you claim for yourself. The only possible good is happiness. The only time and place for it are now and here, and the way to get it is to make everybody else happy. General Woodford says I'll be held accountable. I am ready now, and when I settle no man or woman can say I injured him or her."

Colonel Ingersoll's Tribute to Roscoe Conkling.

From the World of May 10th.

Roscoe Conkling's birthplace to-night paid a most glowing tribute to the memory of the great patriot and statesman. The Academy of Music, the largest building in Albany, was packed an hour before the time for the beginning of the memorial services arranged in his honor. Nearly four thousand admirers, and in some instances close friends of the senator, squeezed into the building, jammed pit, galleries, and stage, and long before 8 o'clock the crush was so tremendous that the doors were closed and fully three thousand turned away. The hall was devoid of decoration except for a large engraving of Mr. Conkling, enveloped with the star-spangled banner, that stood before the speaker's stand. The exercises opened with the reading by Senate Clerk John Kenyon of the resolutions adopted by both branches of the legislature upon the reception of the news of Mr. Conkling's death. Then in graceful manner the lieutenant-governor introduced the orator of the evening, Colonel Ingersoll. He was received with hearty applause on the part of the multitude. In tones of eloquence and pathos rarely equaled, the faithful and tried friend of the great departed began his oration. For over an hour he held the audience spellbound, as, from boyhood to the tomb, he traced the life and public services of Mr. Conkling. Frequently he was interrupted by bursts of applause. When he described the ex-senator as a man who knew his enemies and whose enemies knew him, the politicans in the crowd quickly caught the point, and for a moment the Academy rang with shouts of approval. These demonstrations were repeated when the speaker referred to Mr. Conkling's patience and forbearance during the days he suffered from treachery, abuse, and insult at the hands of his political enemies. Though Colonel Ingersoll read from notes, the beauty, tenderness, and vigor of his oration were not at all marred. He retired amidst most enthusiastic plaudits.

In the course of his eulogy Colonel Ingersoll said:

Roscoe Conkling—a great man, an orator, a statesman, a lawyer, a distinguished citizen of the republic, in the zenith of his fame and power has reached his journey's end; and we are met, here in the city of his birth, to pay our tribute to his worth and work. He earned and held a proud position in the public thought. He stood for independence, for courage, and above all for absolute integrity, and his name was known and honored by many millions of his fellow-men.

The literature of many lands is rich with the tributes that gratitude, admiration, and love hav paid to the great and honored dead. These tributes disclose the character of nations, the ideals of the human race. In them we find the estimates of greatness—the deeds and lives that challenged praise and thrilled the hearts of men.

In the presence of death, the good man judges as he would be judged. He knows that men are only fragments—that the greatest walk in shadow, and that faults and failures mingle with the lives of all.

In the grave should be buried the prejudices and passions born of conflict. Charity should hold the scales in which are weighed the deeds of men. Peculiarities, traits born of locality and surroundings—these are but the dust of the race—these are accidents, drapery, clothes, fashions, that hav nothing to do with the man except to hide his character. They are the clouds that cling to mountains. Time givs us clearer vision. That which was merely local fades away. The words of envy are forgotten, and all there is of sterling worth remains. He who was called a partisan is a patriot. The revolutionist and the outlaw are the founders of nations, and he who was regarded as a scheming, selfish politician becomes a statesman, a philosopher, whose words and deeds shed light.

Fortunate is that nation great enough to know the great. When a great man dies—one who has nobly fought the battle of a life, who has been faithful to every trust, and has uttered his highest, noblest thought—one who has stood proudly by the right in spite of jeer and taunt, neither stopped by foe nor swerved by friend—in honoring him, in speaking words of praise and love above his dust, we pay a tribute to ourselvs.

How poor this world would be without its graves, without the memories of its mighty dead! Only the voiceless speak forever.

Intelligence, integrity, and courage are the great pillars that support the state.

Above all, the citizens of a free nation should honor the brave and independent man—the man of stainless integrity, of will and intellectual force. Such men are the Atlases on whose mighty shoulders rests the great fabric of the republic. Flatterers, cringers, crawlers, time-servers, are the dangerous citizens of a democracy. They who gain applause and power by pandering to the mistakes, the prejudices, and passions of the multitude are the enemies of liberty.

When the intelligent submit to the clamor of the many, anarchy begins, and the republic reaches the edge of chaos. Mediocrity, touched with ambition, flatters the base and calumniates the great, while the true patriot, who will do neither, is often sacrificed.

In a government of the people a leader should be a teacher—he should carry the torch of truth.

Most people are the slaves of habit—followers of custom—believers in the wisdom of the past—and were it not for brave and splendid souls "the dust of antique time would lie unswept, and mountainous error be too highly heaped for truth to overpeer." Custom is a prison, locked and barred by those who long ago were dust, the keys of which are in the keeping of the dead.

Nothing is grander than when a strong, intrepid man breaks chains, levels walls, and breasts the many-headed mob like some great cliff that meets and mocks the innumerable billows of the sea.

The politician hastens to agree with the majority —insists that their prejudice is patriotism, that their ignorance is wisdom—not that he loves them, but because he loves himself. The statesman, the real reformer, points out the mistakes of the multitude, attacks the prejudices of his countrymen, laughs at their follies, denounces their cruelties, enlightens and enlarges their minds, and educates the conscience—not because he loves himself, but because he loves and serves the right and wishes to make his country great and free.

With him defeat is but a spur to further effort. He who refuses to stoop, who cannot be bribed by the promis of success or the fear of failure—who walks the highway of the right, and in disaster stands erect, is the only victor. Nothing is more despicable than to reach fame by crawling—position by cringing.

When real history shall be written by the truthful and the wise, these men, these kneelers at the shrines of chance and fraud, these brazen idols worshiped once as gods, will be the very food of scorn, while those who bore the burden of defeat, who earned and kept their self-respect, who would not bow to man or men for place or power, will wear upon their brows the laurel mingled with the oak.

Roscoe Conkling was a man of superb courage.

He not only acted without fear, but he had that fortitude of soul that bears the consequences of the course pursued without complaint. He was charged with being proud. The charge was true—he was proud. His knees were as inflexible as the "unwedgeable and the gnarled oak," but he was not vain. Vanity rests on the opinion of others—pride, on our own. The source of vanity is from without—of pride, from within. Vanity is a vane that turns, a willow that bends, with every breeze—pride is the oak that defies the storm. One is cloud—the other rock. One is weakness—the other strength.

This imperious man entered public life in the dawn of the reformation—at a time when the country needed men of pride, of principle, and courage. The institution of slavery had poisoned all the springs of power. Before this crime ambition fell upon its knees—politicians, judges, clergymen, and merchant princes bowed low and humbly, with their hats in their hands. The real friend of man was denounced as the enemy of his country—the real enemy of the human race was called a statesman and a patriot. Slavery was the bond and pledge of peace, of union and national greatness. The temple of American liberty was finished—the auction-block was the corner-stone.

It is hard to conceive of the utter demoralization, of the political blindness and immorality, of the patriotic dishonesty, of the cruelty and degradation, of a people who supplemented the incomparable Declaration of Independence with the Fugitiv Slave law.

Think of the honored statesmen of that ignoble time who wallowed in this mire, and who, decorated with dripping filth, received the plaudits of their fellow-men. The noble, the really patriotic, were the victims of mobs, and the shameless were clad in the robes of office.

But let us speak no word of blame—let us feel that each one acted according to his light—according to his darkness.

At last the conflict came. The hosts of light and darkness prepared to meet upon the fields of war. The question was presented: Shall the republic be slave or free? The Republican party had triumphed at the polls. The greatest man in our history was president-elect. The victors were appalled—they shrank from the great responsibility of success. In the presence of rebellion they hesitated—they offered to return the fruits of victory. Hoping to avert war, they were willing that slavery should become immortal. An amendment to the Constitution was proposed to the effect that no subsequent amendment should ever be made that in any way should interfere with the right of man to steal his fellow-men.

This, the most marvelous proposition ever submitted to a congress of civilized men, received in the House an overwhelming majority, and the necessary two-thirds in the Senate. The Republican party, in the moment of its triumph, deserted every principle for which it had so gallantly contended, and with the trembling hands of fear laid its convictions on the altar of compromise.

The Old Guard, numbering but sixty-five in the House, stood as firm as the three hundred at Thermopylæ. Thaddeus Stevens—as maliciously right as any other man was ever wrong—refused to kneel. Owen Lovejoy, remembering his brother's noble blood, refused to surrender. And on the edge of disunion, in the shadow of civil war, with the air filled with sounds of dreadful preparation, while the Republican party was retracing its steps, Roscoe Conkling voted No. This puts a wreath of glory on his tomb. From that vote to the last moment of his life he was a champion of equal rights, stanch and stalwart.

From that moment he stood in the front rank. He never wavered and he never swerved. By his devotion to principle—his courage, the splendor of his diction—by his varied and profound knowledge, his conscientious devotion to the great cause, and by his intellectual scope and grasp, he won and held the admiration of his fellow-men.

Disasters in the field, reverses at the polls, did not and could not shake his courage or his faith. He knew the ghastly meaning of defeat. He knew that the great ship that slavery sought to strand and wreck was freighted with the world's sublimest hope.

He battled for a nation's life—for the rights of slaves—the dignity of labor and the liberty of all. He guarded with a father's care the rights of the hunted, the hated, and despised. He attacked the savage statutes of the reconstructed states with a torrent of invectiv, scorn, and execration. He was not satisfied until the freedman was an American citizen—clothed with every civil right—until the Constitution was his shield—until the ballot was his sword.

And long after we are dead the colored man in this and other lands will speak his name in reverence and love. Others wavered, but he stood firm; some were false, but he was proudly true—fearlessly faithful unto death.

He gladly, proudly grasped the hands of colored men who stood with him as makers of our laws, and treated them as equals and as friends. The cry of "social equality," coined and uttered by the cruel and the base, was to him the expression of a great and splendid truth. He knew that no man can be the equal of the one he robs—that the intelligent and unjust are not the superiors of the ignorant and honest—and he also felt, and proudly felt, that if he were not too great to reach the hand of help and recognition to the slave, no other senator could rightfully refuse.

We rise by raising others—and he who stoops above the fallen stands erect.

Nothing can be grander than to sow the seeds of noble thoughts and virtuous deeds—to liberate the bodies and the souls of men—to earn the grateful homage of a race—and then, in life's last shadowy hour, to know and feel that the historian of liberty will be compelled to write your name.

There are no words intense enough—with heart enough—to express my admiration for the great and gallant souls who hav in every age and every land upheld the right and who hav lived and died for freedom's sake.

In our lives hav been the grandest years that man has lived, that Time has measured by the flight of worlds.

The history of that great party that let the oppressed go free—that lifted our nation from the depths of savagery to freedom's cloudless hights, and tore with holy hands from every law the words that sanctified the cruelty of man, is the most glorious in the annals of our race. Never before was there such a moral exaltation—never a party with a purpose so pure and high. It was the embodied conscience of a nation, the enthusiasm of a people guided by wisdom, the impersonation of justice; and the sublime victory achieved loaded even the conquered with all the rights that freedom can bestow.

Roscoe Conkling was an absolutely honest man.

Honesty is the oak around which all other virtues cling. Without that they fall and groveling die in weeds and dust. He believed that a nation should discharge its obligations. He knew that a promis could not be made often enough, or emphatic enough, to take the place of payment. He felt that the promis of the government was the promis of every citizen, that a national obligation was a personal debt, and that no possible combination of words and pictures could take the place of coin. He uttered the splendid truth that "the higher obligations among men are not set down in writing, signed and sealed, but reside in honor." He knew that repudiation was the sacrifice of honor—the death of the national soul. He knew that without character, without integrity, there is no wealth, and that below poverty, below bankruptcy, is the rayless abyss of repudiation. He upheld the sacredness of contracts, of plighted national faith, and helped to save and keep the honor of his nativ land. This adds another laurel to his brow.

He was the ideal representativ, faithful and incorruptible. He believed that his constituents and his country were entitled to the fruit of his experience, to his best and highest thought. No man ever held the standard of responsibility higher than he. He voted according to his judgment—his conscience. He made no bargains—he neither bought nor sold.

To correct evils, abolish abuses, and inaugurate reforms, he believed was not only the duty, but the privilege, of a legislator. He neither sold nor mortgaged himself. He was in Congress during the years of vast expenditure, of war and waste—when the credit of the nation was loaned to individuals—when claims were thick as leaves in June, when the amendment of a statute, the change of a single word, meant millions, and when empires were given to corporations. He stood at the summit of his power—peer of the greatest—a leader tried and trusted. He had the tastes of a prince, the fortune of a peasant, and yet he never swerved. No corporation was great enough or rich enough to purchase him. His vote could not be bought "for all the sun sees, or the close earth wombs, or the profound seas hide." His hand was never touched by any bribe, and on his soul there never was a sordid stain. Poverty was his priceless crown.

Above his marvelous intellectual gifts—above all place he ever reached—above the ermin he refused—rises his integrity like some great mountain peak, and there it stands, firm as the earth beneath, pure as the stars above.

He was a great lawyer. He understood the framework, the anatomy, the foundations, of law; was familiar with the great streams and currents and tides of authority.

He knew the history of legislation—the principles that hav been settled upon the fields of war. He knew the maxims—those crystallizations of common sense, those hand-grenades of argument.

He was not a case lawyer—a decision-index or an echo; he was original, thoughtful, and profound. He had breadth and scope, resource, learning, logic, and, above all, a sense of justice.

He was painstaking and conscientious—anxious to know the facts—preparing for every attack, ready for every defense. He rested only when the end was reached. During the contest he neither sent nor received a flag of truce.

He was true to his clients—making their case his. Feeling responsibility, he listened patiently to details, and to his industry there were only the limits of time and strength.

He was a student of the Constitution. He knew the boundaries of state and federal jurisdiction, and no man was more familiar with those great decisions that are the peaks and promontories, the headlands and the beacons, of the law.

He was an orator—earnest, logical, intense, and picturesque. He laid the foundation with care, with accuracy and skill, and rose by "cold gradation and well-balanced form" from the corner-stone of statement to the doomed conclusion. He filled the stage. He satisfied the eye—the audience was his. He had that indefinable thing called presence. Tall, commanding, erect, ample in speech, graceful in compliment, Titanic in denunciation, rich in illustration, prodigal of comparison and metaphor; and his sentences, measured and rhythmical, fell like music on the enraptured throng.

He abhorred the Pharisee and loathed all conscientious fraud. He had a profound aversion for those who insist on putting base motivs back of the good deeds of others. He wore no mask. He knew his friends, his enemies knew him.

He had no patience with pretense, with patriotic reasons for unmanly acts. He did his work and bravely spoke his thought.

Sensitiv to the last degree, he keenly felt the blows and stabs of the envious and obscure, of the smallest, of the weakest; but the greatest could not drive him from conviction's field. He would not stoop to ask or giv an explanation. He left his words and deeds to justify themselvs.

He held in light esteem a friend who heard with half-believing ears the slander of a foe. He walked a highway of his own, and kept the company of his self-respect. He would not turn aside to avoid a foe—to greet or gain a friend.

In his nature there was no compromise. To him there were but two paths—the right and wrong. He was maligned, misrepresented, and misunderstood, but he would not answer. He knew that character speaks louder far than any words. He was as silent then as he is now, and his silence, better than any form of speech, refuted every charge.

He was an American—proud of his country, that was and ever will be proud of him. He did not find perfection only in other lands. He did not grow small and shrunken, withered and apologetic, in the presence of those upon whom greatness had been thrust by chance. He could not be overawed by dukes or lords, nor flattered into vertebrateless subserviency by the patronizing smiles of kings. In the midst of conventionalities he had the feeling of suffocation. He believed in the royalty of man, in the sovereignty of the citizen, and in the matchless greatness of this republic.

He was of the classic mold—a figure from the antique world. He had the pose of the great statues, the pride and bearing of the intellectual Greek, of the conquering Roman, and he stood in the wide free air as though within his veins there flowed the blood of a hundred kings.

And as he lived he died. Proudly he entered the darkness, or the dawn, that we call death. Unshrinkingly he passed beyond our horizon, beyond the twilight's purple hills, beyond the utmost reach of human harm or help, to that vast realm of silence or of joy where the innumerable dwell, and he has left with us his wealth of thought and deed—the memory of a brave, imperious, honest man, who bowed alone to death.

"Oh, To be Nothing, Nothing!"

Mr. Heston well illustrates, on the first page, the irresponsibility of "God's creatures" according to the divine scheme. God made the devil to tempt men to sin, and then sent his son to bear the load. The creature is only a bridge between the devil and the deep sea, as it were. While we may admire the ingenuity of the scheme, we can hardly be expected to praise its goodness. If God so loved man that he sent his only begotten son to take his load of sin, it occurs to the ungodly that omnipotent love might hav devised a method of redemption less burdensome to the son—such, for instance, as removing the devil. But, looking at this picture, we can see why the Methodists put their Christian desires into these imploring words:

"Oh, to be nothing, nothing!
Only to lie at his feet,
A broken and empty vessel,
For the savior's use made meet."

A Point for Consideration.

Whoever has thought that Roman Catholicism, which is the only logical system of Christianity, is capable of even tolerating, not to say affirming, the freedom of thought and speech, will be undeceived by reading the short extract we are able to giv from Frederic R. Coudert's reply to Colonel Ingersoll at the Nineteenth Century Club. Mr. Coudert is a trained Roman Catholic, one of the ablest lawyers and speakers of this city, but he has not the caution of a trained theologian. A priest would hav hesitated to so boldly avow his opposition to free speech and free thought, but through Mr. Coudert's vehement anger we are enabled to see the true position of his church.

Four hundred years from now, Mr. Coudert thinks, Freethought might exist and be in harmony with the time. But not now. In this, he probably reasons from the past career of the church. Four centuries ago there was no Freethought. The church suppressed it, and Mr. Coudert seems to wish that he lived then, and is a little surprised that he does not. However, he has to admit that Freethought does exist, which he says is unfortunate! If he could hav his way, not only would speech be restrained, but thought, too, if he could devise means of fettering it. This is the true doctrin of Catholicism, and whenever a Catholic argues otherwise he is but using the sophistry of the Jesuits; or, if he be honest, is teaching heresy.

Between Mr. Coudert's bold avowal that free speech should not be allowed and Colonel Ingersoll's unimpeachable definition of true liberty there is a chasm as wide as the universe. The avowal and the definition mark the difference between Christianity and Freethought. Christianity is the very essence of tyrannical despotism; but in the vocabulary of Freethought there is no room for even the word toleration, for "toleration" of one man's thoughts and speech by another implies the right to suppress it if the other sees fit. There is, there can be, no such right. One man possesses all the natural rights of all the other men in the world, no less, no more.

We cannot "tolerate" a man, because he has the absolute right, equal to our own, to think and to speak his thoughts. The emphasis which Colonel Ingersoll has placed upon this should be carefully noted by every Freethinker, for we fear that some hav not sufficiently considered the point.

The Rejection of the Women.

The Methodist conference has refused seats to the five women who were elected delegates to that body. The vote was close, as a change of one ballot would hav seated them. The opposition was led by J. M. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate of this city, and he was supported by nearly all the ministers. The women's champions were Westerners—men whose lives and ideas hav been broadened by living in a large country. The lay delegates were mostly in favor of admitting the ladies. The question, however, is not settled, but remanded to the annual conferences. If two-thirds of these conferences vote favorably, it will then come before the general conference, in 1892, and the women may expect to vote in the following general conference in 1896. This postponement of the matter was the best that the conservativs could do. The annual conferences in the East will probably vote against the women; in the West, for them.

We believe that this is the first instance of an effort being made by women to hav a voice in the higher counsels of the churches. They are not allowed in the Presbyterian judicatories; the Episcopalians refuse them voice, and the Baptists and Congregationals follow suit. Of course, a woman can hav no vote in high Roman Catholic councils. This is because the churches follow the New Testament in matters of polity, and in their estimation of women. Yet women constitute two-thirds of the membership of all the churches, are their most blind and zealous supporters, and are really responsible for the other third of the membership. If the women left the church, in a decade there would not be a man on the roll. The church would go.

The course of the ministers, then, in refusing them seats in this conference, is clearly short-sighted, though they count, and with apparent reason, on the quiet submission of the excluded delegates. But though this may be the case now, it will not always be so, and when the women get their rights, as in time they must and will, the action of this conference will be a stigma and reproach. It was in this city forty-four years ago that the Methodist church split on the slavery question, though the Northern division, in private sentiment, was by no means unanimous. The present issue, while not involving such grave physical considerations, is one of equal justice. The right of selecting officials who shall rule us is an abstract right, absolutely inalienable. One man can hav no natural authority over another. Choosing rulers is not a privilege to be granted by the rulers to the ruled; the right to choose is natural, and when that right is violated by force or numbers an injustice is committed.

But no other course could be expected from the churchmen. Every right gained in any matter in their control has always had to be fought for, and always will. The church is repressiv, conservativ, tyrannical. It holds women in low esteem. The ministers keep them down in order to keep themselvs up. The women would merit this treatment were it not that, having been in subjection so many centuries, they hav not learned to use their brains to the best advantage.

A Pious Editor as a Sabbatarian and Financier.

Mr. Elliott F. Shepard, the gentleman who so vigorously fights the running of stages on Fifth avenue on Sunday, is a queer character, and as a consequence some of his acts look queer from the standpoint of common, every-day, secular honesty. It turns out that his opposition to the Fifth Avenue Stage Company proceeds from a desire to control the company himself. This he intends to effect by purchasing stock, and to get it cheap he began legal proceedings against Sunday traffic, hoping thereby to diminish the earnings of the company and cheapen the stock. Failing in this, he began bearing the stock in the columns of his paper, publishing statements that the stock was practically worthless, that the directors of the company were selling their holdings for what they could get, and otherwise depreciating the securities, after the manner of all railroad speculators who desire to ruin a road and then buy it low. He had succeeded in purchasing about one-sixth of the stock before his design became known.

Since the disclosure of his scheme, Mr. Shepard finds himself an object of suspicion. It is alleged that should he control the company, he would reorganize it as a street railway, connecting with the Fourth avenue road, which is owned by the Vanderbilts, into which family Mr. Shepard married some years ago, and with whose interests he is closely identified. To relieve himself of this suspicion of hypocrisy, he has procured the writing of a letter to himself by an official of the stage company, asking his intentions. This gives him a chance to fall back on the Sunday question again. His Sabbatical reasoning is unique. He says:

"For more than thirty years stages had run upon the Fifth avenue, without running on Sunday. The ministers of every church on the Fifth avenue, and many others in other parts of the district, besides hundreds of our most orderly, peace-loving, taxpaying, intelligent, liberal-minded citizens, hav petitioned that the stages should not run on Sunday. This on the part of the pastors is substantially their form of advising their respectiv flocks not to use the stages on the Sabbath."

In face of the fact that three-fourths of the Sunday riding is done by church-goers, this is cool. Either members of Fifth avenue churches are very insubordinate, or Mr. Shepard has misconstrued the ministers' motivs in signing his petition.

Our modern crusader then slides from precedent to physiology, and presents this:

"Physicians hav certified that the strain of the noise, excitement, and vibration produced by a procession of over a thousand thunder-producing and earth-shaking omnibuses on the Sabbath is injurious to the health and nervous system of those subjected to it, and the injury will be all the more accentuated now that the period of the year has arrived when it is usual for residents to hav their windows open."

We should like to see these certificates, and learn the reason why a noise on Sunday is worse for the nerves than the same noise on Monday. The certificates, we fancy, would bear a striking resemblance to the certificates of stock Mr. Shepard desires to hold, providing he can get them cheap.

Those who ride to church, Mr. Shepard anathematizes as robbers:

"These people do not remember how much profanation of the holy day has to take place to giv them their rides of inglorious ease. If they would look behind the scenes, they would no sooner spend their money in the encouragement of this great mass of Sabbath-breaking than they would rob God's altar in any other way—for this is one way of robbing him of the service and honor that are justly his due from all his children."

Proceeding, our religious stockholder says:

"Now, as there are many good people who think that some means of Sunday transportation in our great city is a necessity, conceding this to be true, there is ample accommodation for all that in the avenues next to Fifth avenue on each side, where it has long been established by law and custom. These surface lines were established before this generation, and the elevated is only their natural outgrowth and the question of discontinuing them is very distinct and different from that of not commencing a new and wholly unnecessary line, on an avenue which has hitherto enjoyed freedom from the Sunday traffic. Nor am I interested, directly or indirectly, in any of those other lines, nor responsible for what they do or do not. But I am responsible in regard to this new company, together with every Christian and Jew, hat there shall be a substantial compliance with the Fourth Commandment, by cessation of the business of transportation one day in seven along this new line."

That is to say, the people may rob God's altar on other avenues, but not on Fifth avenue, because Mr. Shepard desires to be quiet, and to get the stock of the Stage Company at a low price.

But the most conclusiv argument advanced is this:

"I hav studied the question of Sunday work in our own country, in Canada, England, France, Belgium, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and the Orient, and the fair conclusion is that by rest from labor on Sunday one will make fifty per cent gain, as against a loss of one-seventh, or about fourteen per cent. In other words, the net profit in favor of keeping Sunday is about thirty-six per cent, so that companies which work on Sunday giv up fifty per cent for the sake of making fourteen; and that is bad finance."

If this figuring is accurate, it opens the way to colossal fortunes for all. If the net gain for not running on Sunday is thirty-six per cent, by not running on Saturday the net gain would be doubled, or seventy-six per cent. By discontinuing the stages altogether the company could pay enormous dividends. As a financier, Deacon Shepard goes ahead of his Yankee brethren. As THE TRUTH SEEKER never expects to own any stock of the Fifth Avenue Stage Company, we shall watch Mr. Shepard's efforts on behalf of himself and the Lord with great interest.

The Archbishops in Politics.

According to Hugh P. McElrone, a gentleman high up in the church, who speaks on the authority of a still more "distinguished ecclesiastic," the Knights of Labor, the American Federation of Labor, and the members of Dr. McGlynn's Anti-Poverty Society will, within the year, be condemned or excommunicated by the Romish church. Thirteen archbishops will meet next month in Baltimore to consider whether the organizations and persons mentioned deserve such a fate, and the conclusion of the "distinguished ecclesiastic" is that they do.

The complaint against the Knights is that their constitution is Socialistic, and that though Mr. Powderly is completely subservient to the church, he cannot control the members of the order, which must inevitably be condemned upon the charges made months ago, and which still lie at the bar of the Holy Office. The attempt of Mr. Powderly and Cardinal Gibbons to bring the order under control of the church is told by Mr. McElrone: The Holy Office was on the point of considering the charges when Mr. Powderly hastened to Baltimore and held a long interview with Mr. Gibbons. Mr. McElrone relates that Mr. Gibbons expressed himself as highly pleased with Mr. Powderly, who had offered to hav expunged from the Knights' constitution any passages which might, in Mr. Gibbons's judgment, be repugnant to the Roman Catholic church. Mr. Gibbons marked a good many passages to which he objected. Mr. Powderly tried to fulfill his promis, but was unable to do so, and could only agree to do in the future all he could to oblige Mr. Gibbons.

Mr. Gibbons was graciously pleased to be pleased with Mr. Powderly, who would hav allowed him to wipe his boots upon him had Mr. Gibbons desired such a door-mat, and prevailed upon the pope, Mr. Gibbons's master, to defer the condemnation of the Knights in the United States, though the order in Canada had been anathematized. But as the Knights hav not changed their constitution, and as Mr. Powderly is not yet the absolute ruler of the organization, the high ecclesiastic who imparts information to Mr. McElrone fears the decision of the coming conclave of archbishops will be unfavorable to the stiff-necked Knights. Undoubtedly

The second subject which the archbishops will consider is Mr. Gompers's American Federation of Labor, composed chiefly of cigarmakers, and the mechanics of kindred trades. As few of the members of the Federation are Catholics, and as "its constitution embraces all the tenets of Communism or Fourierism, such as that so earnestly but vainly preached by Horace Greeley, through the medium of his powerful newspaper, for some ten years before the war," Mr. McElrone is decidedly of the opinion that it will be condemned. Mr. McElrone's high authority fails to state, however, what the membership or non-membership of Catholics in any organization has to do with the accuracy of its principles. If the church is going to hew to the line, it should not stop to consider who will be cut in the chopping operation.

The third point for consideration by the archiepiscopal Star Chamber is Dr. McGlynn. This gentleman, Mr. McElrone confesses, is out of the reach of the church. He is no longer a Catholic, properly speaking, because he has cut entirely loose from the church by refusing to obey his superiors. Neither is the single-tax theory which he advocates one which the church can condemn, because the state has the right to tax the kind of property it pleases. Mr. George's theory therefore "lies in the exclusiv region of politics, and there is nothing morally wrong in advocating it." But Dr. McGlynn has said that if he had the power he "would confiscate every inch of land, without one penny of compensation to the miscalled owners," and he is moreover the head of a political party composed of Catholics. As his doctrin of land-grabbing is Socialistic, and as he himself is an excommunicated priest, the question for the archbishops to decide is what course shall the church pursue toward those Catholics who support him. "Can Catholics," asks the high ecclesiastic, "belong to a party or an association whose avowed platform may be innocuous enough, but whose ex-communicated leader has enunciated rank Socialism, and whose tendency is decidedly in the same direction?" The high ecclesiastic says, No. But still another cause of action against Dr. McGlynn is the alleged fact "that behind him stand powerful and unscrupulous men" who are using him "to destroy society and religion." In this contingency, then, "it becomes the duty of the church to speak, and it is not an uncertain guess to surmise that Catholics will be warned to shun Dr. McGlynn's Anti-Poverty Society."

This is the program laid out for the archbishops, as outlined by high ecclesiastical authority. The decrees will go to Rome, be confirmed, and reach this country just about the time the people are voting for president. Incidentally, the McGlynn voters in this city will be whipped back into the ranks of the Democracy, and the church will get her annual appropriations as usual. The Catholic authorities are singularly free from guile in all their doings, and work only for the benefit of "Mother Church." This advance outline of the purposed condemnation is probably put out to see how the people take it, what the Knights and the others interested will do, and whether the church can carry out the program without losing thousands of paying adherents.

The Society for the Conversion of the Jews.

In the Hebrew Christian, a little church paper published by the Society for the Conversion of the Jews, Howard Crosby publishes a letter defending himself for lending his name to the society. He says:

"Is it fair to find fault with us when we endeavor to show the reasons of our belief to our Jewish brethren, that they may rejoice with us in the fulfilment of Jewish prophecies, in which fulfilment is peace to every sinner's soul? Why should our motivs be impugned and our characters slandered? Why should malice and hatred be stirred up in your own hearts? Let us leave to low-minded men all this business of prejudice and contumely, and, as humble believers in the God of Abraham, stand on the ground of brotherly love, according to the scripture which we all revere, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.' It is only in that love we long to see you recognizing the glorious messiah who has died for the sin of the world."

The Hebrew Standard, an orthodox Jewish paper, retorts:

"Dr. Crosby knows full well that it would be a ridiculous assertion for him to make that we Jews find fault with him for trying to make us see that Christianity is the true Judaism, if by that he means the regular and proper channels of church effort. He should know that we find fault only with the despicable, disgraceful, mercenary convert-mongering of the missionaries whom he and others support and countenance, to the greater shame and discredit of Christianity.

"We find fault with them for utilizing designing and uncultured vagrants for the purpose of trying to convert the Jews, and for not seeing whether ever a Jew was converted to whom some direct or indirect pecuniary, or other material, advantage was not given or offered; whether ever any one of these converts contributed one cent for the support of any church or charity; whether ever any respectable, self-supporting, intelligent Jew was induced to associate himself with the miserable crew of self-seeking conversionists."

The Independent comments upon this reply, calling upon the Standard to prove the charges. It says:

"The charge is plain. It is that the missionaries of this society for converting Jews to Christianity are designing and uncultured creatures, who depend on bribery to secure their converts. We pay no attention to the rest of the article, which tries to make Dr. Crosby see how badly he would feel if somebody should try to make his son a Catholic, because it is not based on buying but convincing the convert, and this our neighbor has just said is legitimate, and so it contradicts itself. But here is the charge, that the Jewish mission in this city buys its converts, and gets none who are of any character, none but those who accept its teachings for pecuniary reasons.

"This charge it has no right to make unless it can prove it. If true, it can be, it should be, proved by definit evidence or specification. If not, let it be withdrawn. It is simply the money question. Are there no converts to whom the charge of corruption cannot apply, men who hav lost rather than gained by their conversion? Hav the funds of the society been used illegitimately to support the converts? Giv us the analysis of the converts; giv us the analysis of the funds expended. Prove this serious charge or say nothing."

We are glad to see the Independent taking up this matter. Mr. A. Benjamin, a Hebrew gentleman who is about as near an Infidel as he is a Jew, has been for months vainly endeavoring to get the Christians who are supporting the Rev. Jacob Freshman, the activ missionary of the Society for the Conversion of the Jews, to investigate this matter. He has been to the Rev. Howard Crosby, who is an officer of the society, to Dr. Deems, to the editor of the Christian Union, to Dr. William Ward Hayes, editor of the Independent, and to the editors of the daily papers, making his charges, and begging for an opportunity to be heard. In THE TRUTH SEEKER and Herald he has challenged Mr. Freshman to read the Bible in Hebrew, he has offered to show that his annual reports were false, and by his persistent following of Mr. Freshman he has made that zealous missionary amend them. Mr. Benjamin has been repulsed everywhere but in THE TRUTH SEEKER and Herald offices. The clergymen and religious editors hav refused to listen. Even Dr. Ward, when he found that Mr. Benjamin, though not a Jew in religion, is not a Christian, had no use for him.

But now that the ball is opened, let us hav the truth about this Society for the Conversion of Jews. Giv Mr. Benjamin a chance to prove his assertions, or Mr. Freshman the opportunity of exonerating himself. Mr. Benjamin avows his readiness to go before the Christian officers of the society, and show the character of the very few converts, why they were converted, and how unfit Mr. Freshman is to be employed as a missionary to his race. But he must hav the assistance of the officers of the society, and a chance to cross-examin Mr. Freshman and investigate that gentleman's statements and books. The London Society for the Conversion of the Hebrews spends thousands and thousands of dollars with the most miserable results. Is the New York Society cut in the same shape?

Editorial Notes.

LEAPING up in his pulpit last Sunday the Rev. Mr. Talmage shouted: "There are those who treat Infidelity as a joke. If Infidelity and Atheism triumphed, it would imply the complete degradation of woman. Woman is not, perhaps, as yet completely emancipated. She may hav her wrongs. But Christianity has come to her and remained with her as a blessing. In Christian countries only are her rights recognized. In Christian countries only has she freedom, individuality, hope. The second result of the triumph of Atheism and Infidelity, is the complete demoralization of society. What the Infidels hate most of all is retribution. They hate the idea of hell, just as the criminal hates the idea of the prison or the penitentiary. Oh, if they could only get rid of hell what would they not do? They would make a hell upon earth, and they would not be long about it. Every Infidel," he said—and he repeated the statement and emphasized it—"every Infidel dies in stolid indifference or in horror. What hav not Christ and Christianity done for the world? What has Infidelity done? Take a piece of foolscap and write down on the four pages what it has done. Too much space. Take a page. Too much space. Take a leaf of your own note-book. Too much. Take your ten fingers. Take one finger. Nothing—absolutely nothing." At this stage Dr. Talmage literally screamed, "Get out, get out, you miserable pauper; crawl into your hole of everlasting nothing!" At the conclusion of this outburst there was commotion and clapping of hands in the audience. It is superfluous to remark that facts do not bear out the Rev. Mr. Talmage's assertions, which we quote merely as a curiosity of Christian literature and not for the purpose of serious consideration. Mr. Talmage is a joke.

WHEN E. A. Stevens read Helen Gardener's "Sex in Brain" he was hit in his conscience with a brick of contrition. As open confession is good for the soul, we print his letter for the further glory—she has grace enough—of Miss Gardener: "DEAR EUGENE: Intended sending my thanks for that most excellent article—brimful of facts and of utmost import to humanity—by Major Powell on 'Evolution in Civilized Man,' but neglected it; now on reading and rereading 'Sex in Brain,' I cannot longer refrain from expressing my profound appreciation for the quality of mental food you are furnishing us, and my deep sense of gratitude to the author for her clear, conclusiv, and thoroughly scientific and logical defense of woman's mental endowments. It is so spiced with wit and incisiv irony and sarcasm that she adds zest and entertainment to an otherwise profound but somber subject. How Frances Willard must hav squirmed during its delivery! This lecture alone lays her sex under lasting obligations, and wins her the esteem and gratitude of every lover of justice. Do you know, Eugene, that my cheeks fairly burn with humiliation and mortification when I remember my most ungallant attack of some years ago, and I hav felt a deep sense of shame whenever I recalled it. When at the New York Congress waiting the opening, I noticed a bright-eyed, petite, and exceedingly amiable lady trying to get people acquainted and make everyone feel comfortable. When Putnam said he would introduce me to Helen Gardener, I looked around for some austere and severe dowager, but, behold, in a moment I was confronting the polite and considerate little lady whose movements had already attracted my attention. The introduction followed, and she smiled such a good-natured, roguish smile, and said, 'This is the individual who was after my scalp.' Well, I felt like a horse-thief confronted by complete and convincing testimony, and wished that I had been lynched to save myself from further refinement of cruelty. I attempted to stammer out a boobyish apology, but I never was up on those things, and, as I was the most sadly disappointed person imaginable, I completely failed. She, however, heaped coals of fire on my defenseless head by special words of attention to my daughter, and I was unable to express my chagrin during the whole of my stay. Never felt so mean about anything in my life."

Letters from Friends.

CORINTH, ILL., April 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav seen but one letter from this place, so I thought to see another I would write it. Another soldier has dropped out of the Freethought ranks. Mrs. Anna Williams, of this vicinity, died March 29th. She was a true Liberal, and has been ever since I hav known her. Her husband is an outspoken Liberal. There are many Liberals living around here. I hav read several letters from my grandfather in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours sincerely in the bonds of friendship,

WM. W. WILLIAMS.

ANNAPOLIS, ILL., April 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to make a suggestion to the effect that some of the writers and contributors of THE TRUTH SEEKER, or the Editor, review from week to week the International Sunday-school Lessons. Each one has its Golden text, Memory verses, Geographical notes, etc. Now, I know that among the many able contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER there are those that can write an interesting article every week, and not study very hard either.

MARTIN NEWLIN.

SOUTH LOWELL, ALA., May 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I do not see how I can do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. It givs a hearing to all sides on any subject, and appeals to human reason, and not to impulse and fear. I love it for its love of justice in every department of mental activity. In this way we can discover truth, and learn to adapt ourselvs to it. Some peop e will not reason, and such must be shown their folly by the cartoons, and Watson Heston is doing this well. Could he show Nebuchadnezzar eating grass (Dan. iv, 33)? Make a good picture of it and let them see what they believe. J. K. DEARTH.

KINGSTON, April 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: After reading THE TRUTH SEEKER the past year, I will say that I like it better than any other paper I hav ever read. We hav any amount of superstition to contend with. Last fall the Latter Day Saints started a protracted—or distracted—meeting in Kingston. The Methodists, to checkmate them, imported Clark Braden to down them in discussion. Braden wanted to discuss Joe Smith, and the Saints wanted to discuss Methodism. As an outcome they threw mud at each other.

We hav a few independent thinkers here, and plenty of would-be's if not for Mrs. Grundy. We had C. B. Reynolds here last November. He delivered four lectures to small but attentiv audiences. The weather was very unpleasant; otherwise I think more would hav listened to him.

W. A. COLVIN.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., April 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: If you see no adverse reason, I would like to say a word to the "well to do" of THE TRUTH SEEKER family in behalf of Mr. Heston, in the paper he is doing so much to enhance the interest and value of. His cartoons are instructiv and valuable. They abound in good sense, humor, and logic, and, I believe, are very generally appreciated. I see them often commended by the correspondents of the paper. One sensible lady, in the "Letters from Friends," has well said, "We ought to get up a vote of thanks to Mr. Heston." Now, I second that motion, and would suggest that bank-notes be used for ballots in this canvass. And it is in order to "vote early and vote often," for Mr. Heston is poor and in rather embarrassed circumstances, having a mortgage on his little home. I think his labors in the cause of Freethought are equal in value to those of the best lecturers, and ought to be well paid. I hav had the pleasure of casting my vote, and I hope many others who are able will "go and do likewise," for he richly deserves a friendly and favorable recognition from all lovers of truth and progress. The Truth Seeker Company doubtless pay him for his work all they can well afford, and we do not want our paper to be overburdened. ALMOND OWEN.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., April 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Reading in your paper that a bill has been introduced to repeal the Comstock law, I wish to call attention to an article in Lucifer, March 16th, headed, "Is Sanity Returning?" and the accompanying editorial headed, "Shall They be Repealed?" The first article is suggested by the report of the Congressional committee on the post-office and post-roads upon House bills Nos. 3,320 and 3,324, providing that newspapers and periodicals containing advertisments of lotteries shall be excluded from the mail, and also (in one of them) that the postmaster-general shall hav power to determin what papers come within the law. The committee sanely reported against both bills, on the ground that this one establishes a censorship of the press, and that both assume in Congress a power to abridge the liberty of the press, contrary to the Constitution of the United States. Very clearly these objections lie just as much against the Comstock law. In the editorial Lucifer argues that the signs of returning sanity denote that the tide of paternalistic craziness is turning, and that now is the time to push a movement for repeal. I say, Amen, and hope that before the spasm of sense has spent its force the Liberal world may be roused to send in another monster petition for one definit object—the passage of the Cummings bill, whose preamble seems to be right to the point. Let there be no quibbling or halfway work about it—no fool talk about modification, no haggling over the question of state rights. That the states should hav power which the national government has not may be absurd. That they should hav power to interfere with freedom of the press is wrong. But Congress, at all events, has no such power under the Constitution. That should settle the matter of "modification," even if it were possible, which it is not, to frame a definition of obscenity which should exclude Milton, Rabelais, Shakspere, Boccaccio, Horace, Juvenal, and the Bible, and include anything else. C. L. JAMES.

PORTLAND, ORE., April 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: When I wrote you last from Kansas, saying, "Stop my paper," for I was going to be on the wing, I did not know whither I should drift, but, after lecturing in northern California some, I concluded to come into Oregon and get acquainted with our folks—all those that hav got out of the mud of superstition and sail under the banner of Freethought. There seem to be as many Freethinkers as church bigots anywhere upon this coast, and I expect a tidal wave of Freethought to rise on the shores of the mild Pacific, and flow back over mountain and prairie, river and forest, that shall cause the walls of Eastern superstition to crumble and fall worse than the ram's horn did old Babylon.

These steep, grand, evergreen-covered mountains, whose snowy peaks are away above the murky clouds, surround most lovely valleys and canyons awaiting the crowded home-seekers of the East to come and enjoy a climate of mildness and health. We hav very little of pneumonia, typhoid, or other fevers, and no frozen ears or feet, but fruit and flowers everywhere. Plenty of government land, and good, choice, improved farms for $5.50 to $10 per acre; very fine lumber at $8 per thousand. Cattle and horses liv all winter here in Oregon without care or attention. This is emphatically the place for a poor man, if he is able and willing to work, for there is everything in abundance and work plenty. Three to four days will bring anyone in the United States by railroad to this coast. Steam practically annihilates space, so let the homeless Liberals come to the land of big trees and glorious climate. D. C. SEYMOUR.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: What I write upon this subject may possibly hav some tendency to excite the ire of some of the ladies under whose eye it may chance to fall, but I hope not. If the ballot should be placed in the hands of women, the pious women would outvote the Infidel women three to one, and it is plain that every Infidel in the land would be disfranchised. Not a Freethinker in the country would be allowed to hold any office. Hypocrits would be manufactured by the million. God, Jesus Christ, and the Holy Ghost would be put into the Constitution forthwith. Yes, the ballot in the hands of woman, so long as she is controled by sky-pilots, would be a curse—not a blessing. We hav bad laws enough now, and if she should hav the ballot there would be a lot of pious laws enacted which might lead to a bloody civil war. There are millions in the country who would not be governed by the thousand laws which the pious would enact in the name of Jehovah.

Sex should hav nothing to do with citizenship or the ballot, the word of Paul to the contrary notwithstanding. Our great Infidel and Paul do not agree at all in this matter. The former says woman has as many rights as man, and one more, which is protection; while Paul says she has no rights at all. Paul will hav to take a back seat in future.

What needs to be done first is to cast the Holy Ghost out of the pious, for so long as he remains there will not be sufficient room for reason, science, and common sense.

I hav much faith in moral suasion, but I should like to see the ballot in the hands of woman now, in order that she might vote upon the liquor question, for I think she would annihilate the liquor business. LYMAN SMITH.

LEXINGTON, April 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I will present a few disconnected reflections.

Many years ago, in France, in the Faubourg St. Antoine, a street was packed for a mile with bleeding, wounded, human beings. They loved freedom better than their own life. (Then tell me, is not liberty safe in their hands?) Their blood poured like a river down the street gutters. The Nationalists were trying to crush them. Citizen Delescluze came to redeem a promis and help them. He was murdered, his body picked up and carried away. Gambon was there also, defending a barricade. He who had labored for the republic for thirty years was seized, dragged to a private street, and shot. And so hav men been murdered in the United States for attempting to form some plan for the relief of the poor. I should think that imprisonment was sufficient punishment for violent language uttered in the defense of the weak and helpless. A good writer has lately observed that a discontented beggar has more influence than priests, lawyers, and politicians; and so it is, for the golden dream of Parnell for his country faded when he beheld their rags, destitution, misery, with starved bodies festering in pools.

Some persons suppose that tortures are utilized by God, to bring sinners to repentance. The great Cecil was engaged in writing prayers when his victims were racked in the Tower of London. Our clergyman told us yesterday that we were "daily transformed more and more into the nature of Christ!" and the more diamonds, silks, and laces some people hav, the more does grace abound. "God's flowers are scattered everywhere." I should think the rocks would cry out when these blossoms adorn the pillow of a starved baby! Let "holiness" be written upon the bells of horses," although there are twelve millions in England who cannot be fed. Let God and his followers mock on, and then be not surprised it the day cometh which shall burn as an oven.

A Christian just now inquired how I could know the difference between right and wrong, not being a Christian. I could hav referred him to Socrates, Cicero, and Confucius, whose noble thoughts hav made morality and civilization what they are. Suppose we had been abandoned to the teachings of the bloodthirsty, sensual, and degraded Moses, David, or Hosea, what would we be? A penitentiary would be ashamed to harbor them. Said Ingersoll, "God or no God, murder is crime." John Knox remarked that "God must be obeyed, in defiance of the laws of the land." Warm such a serpent as that in your bosom and take the consequences if you will.

Mrs. Ritchey remarks that evolution requires time for developments which has not been given. But time is not the chief factor in the creation, but power. Behold the Greeks achieving miracles in learning and the arts in the midst of savage nations. Notice the languages of Asia Minor, some of them smooth and expressiv—those of Ionia or Phrygia—the rest a barbarous jargon. Sir Charles Lyell said that "nature givs many a bound."

Society often becomes depraved while civilization advances. The efforts of five or six men occasionally are required to revolutionize the world, and they generally are obliged to wade knee-deep in blood. ALHAZA.

WEST UNION, IA., April 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In this city of professed Liberalism there is nothing by which the stranger could discover anything outside of the old and worn nut of orthodoxy. Here the veil of superstition hangs in heavy folds and givs to the city a godly appearance. In fact, it seems but a little in advance of its neighbor town, Fayette, whose limits, so it is said, are decorated with signboards on which it reads, "None but Methodists allowed." Their advancement here consists in not being partial as to creed, inasmuch as no less than six spires tell the story of Christ, and as many denominations wage war with each other for the privilege of saving what man has not—a soul—from a mythical hell.

This city, which has listened to the eloquence of a Remsburg and the logic of a Watts, has reared no monument in honor of their labor, and since their departure the Secularists hav crept back into their holes, there to lie dormant until another worker comes and rouses them from their lethargy. Since my being here I hav met no Liberalism except my own TRUTH SEEKER, although I know there must be many more of the same mind.

Why is it that, after having thrown off the shackles of dogmas, many Liberals will sit carelessly by and see others bound with the same fetters which they hav burst, and make no effort to relieve them?

I hav always supposed that there were Liberals enough in this town to form a society. If so, why is it not done, so we can continually spread before the public a repast of Liberalism and advancement, instead of silently permitting them to feed on the chaff and husks of retardment?

I should very much enjoy being a member of the congregation of the Forum and under the pastorage of President Stevens.

Of THE TRUTH SEEKER I will say: It suits me. I will never stop my paper because I may differ with some of its correspondents, or Editor either, for that matter.

In his inimitable style, Heston discharges his shafts of ridicule into the receding carcass of theology in such a manner as cannot fail of being effectiv. The cartoons are just what are necessary.

Liberals of West Union, I would be pleased to meet you.

J. W. YEADON.

EUREKA, CAL., April 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10, which please apply as follows: $5 subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for the next two years; giv Mr. Heston $2.50 as a token of my appreciation of his able illustrations of the Bible. I always hav considered the Bible a useless book, but as a subject of illustration in Mr. Heston's light it is of no mean value. Send me "Bible Morality," by C. Watts; "Volapük," and the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, and place the remainder to my credit.

Now, let me tell you something of my opinion in regard to THE TRUTH SEEKER and its correspondents. I am glad you hav given us a rest about the Anarchists. I, like all old Californians, am Anarchistically inclined—that is, I would rather redress my grievances myself than apply to a court of justice—but I never hav had any desire to trample upon other people's rights or tyrannize over them. The Chicago Anarchists were the reverse of that; they wanted a despotism of the meanest kind, provided they themselvs could play the despots. All our actions derive their value from the motivs which cause them, and free speech in word or print derives its value from the same source. Reformers speak and print for the sake of enlightening the public, and the widest possible range ought to be allowed them; agitators speak and print for the sake of inflaming the passions of the people, and when they succeed so far that riot and murder are the consequences of their speeches, the public, through their agents, are compelled by necessity to put a stop to it. Such was the case with the Chicago Anarchists.

You hav a valuable contributor in Mr. Van Buren Denslow. He has Mr. Ingersoll's reflection, if he does lack his poetical talent. Nothing that I hav seen in print on the labor question equals Mr. Denslow's articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I do not judge from theory, as I hav been a wage-worker for more than twenty-five years. I was thrown on my own resources when a little over thirteen years old, and now I am nearly sixty. I hav worked in Germany, in France, in the Middle and Southern states, and in California, and being a mechanic by both trade and nature, and easily adapting myself to new circumstances, I hav worked not only in different positions, but in different trades. My judgment, therefore, ought to be better than the judgment of our average latter-day reformer, who judges everything without knowing anything.

I am sorry to learn that J. Hacker is so full of things not worth knowing. Mr. J. Swinton was full likewise. He started a paper to giv his feelings vent, emptied himself out and the world is no better off on account of it. Such men deserve pity, but not support. They are honest, but visionary; they harm themselvs, but do not benefit mankind. There is but one lever by which mankind can be raised, and that is intelligence. Men like Hacker, Swinton, Harman, Walker, and a host of others I might mention, can do nothing in the way of reform. Either they launch forth to the world their impracticable schemes, or they work upon the prejudices and passions of the public, neither of which can be of any benefit to mankind. It is true, we are drifting toward a state of excessiv riches and abject poverty; but, if the laboring classes would stop the drift, they must make use of two levers—intelligence and energy—but at present both are neglected.

I am glad your brother and Putnam came to this coast; they are just the men we want. ROBERT GUNTHER.

FREDONIA, N. Y., April 20, 1888.

ESTEEMED FRIENDS OF THE FLAG ABOVE THE CROSS: May your bold and awakening efforts be appreciated as never before as our understandings are more and more aroused to the flag's advancing foes. It ill becomes us to spend any time upon trifling or minor subjects at such times when momentous questions await our timely presentation and solution.

I hav striven in my own mind the last two years when I could well dispense with the expense and time of reading THE TRUTH SEEKER. But the ever-renewed changes of such intense interest to every progressiv mind are such that I hav not yet been able to say, I hav no further need of thee. We must continue to rally around the flag of Freethought as weekly raised aloft to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. As often as we dine at your rich and rare table of Freethought, of sweet liberty to manhood and womanhood, may we appreciate your efforts to procure and prepare those costly viands for the thoughtful mind. PLINY SMITH.

LONGSTREET, GA., April 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: W. L. Worley is really troubled because Colonel Ingersoll has said, "We do as we must," and calls this his "doctrin," "untenable ground," "akin to Presbyterianism," etc.

I do not suppose that the colonel will explain, and you, Mr. Editor, cannot hav the time or inclination to answer all questions. So I will simply say to Brother Worley: I suppose the colonel means that all men are to some extent influenced by circumstances, and sometimes by circumstances we cannot control; that's all. No "doctrin" in that; no "untenable ground;" no touch of Calvinism, or any other ism, but a statement of a universally admitted fact.

He did not mean that man is a machine, to be manipulated by Gods or devils, according to Calvin. Oh, no! Neither do I think he will admit what you claim, "That man has the power to make himself quite free," and hence, independent of circumstances, environments, conditions.

We claim to be Freethinkers, but we find it impossible to do always as we wish. T. N. MASON.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., April 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: C. B. Reynolds has come and gone. Many good wishes go with him. He spoke here three times, and each time the hall was crowded. We hav a society here known as the Coöperativ Spiritual Union, with a broad platform. Many Materialists hav joined with us. As our present speaker, Paul A. Smith, introduced Mr. Reynolds to the audience, he said: "I shall expect you to speak your sentiments. We shall expect you to exercise the right to speak without regard to the difference of opinion that may exist between us." Mr. Reynolds's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER in which he had given the Spiritualists a rather bad send-off had been received. A few Spiritualists took strong grounds against him. He had been invited by us to speak. Better counsel prevailed, We gave him a cordial welcome and a full house. His lectures were received with applause, and notwithstanding Mr. W. J. Colville occupied the Louis Opera House at the same hours, the old M.E. church was packed to hear Mr. Reynolds, the audience far exceeding that at the Opera House. The Liberal element, including Agnostics, Materialists, Spiritualists, etc., are making their influence felt in this place. I think there is no other place in the United States with as large a percentage of Liberals as here. The Spiritualists far outnumber any other branch of Freethinkers here—in fact, are the only organized branch. It is only fair to say that quite a large minority are Agnostics and Materialists. Great good will come of this. S. P. Putnam occupied our platform while here a few weeks ago. He had crowded houses, and left many friends. W. C. Bowman will speak for us in the month of May, and perhaps longer. Anyway, we shall keep the ball rolling. From time to time I will giv you a report of our progress. H. H. NICHOLS.

MORGAN CITY, UTAH, April 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The indefatigable worker, Dr. J. L. York, who during the last winter has been lecturing in this territory, lectured in this county on the evenings of April 4th and 5th last, and a fine time we had, for the doctor is simply immense. The court house was readily obtained, and, regardless of the fact that the faithful had been dissuaded by the "stake-president" (the highest ecclesiastical authority in the county) from going to the lectures, the house was well filled on both occasions. As usual, the forbidden fruit had to be tasted, and I assure you the doctor gave it in very liberal doses. The audiences consisted mainly of the younger element of the people, and it is impossible but that a lasting impression must hav been made upon their minds. The gospel-befogged brains of the older population seem to be more impenetrable. Laughter and applause of the lecturer's wit and irresistible logic was very frequent. He is giving such death-dealing blows to Christianity, no denomination excepted, that even some Liberals thought him rather hard on our Mormon friends. Dr. York, and lecturers of his kind, will not, nor should they be, soft-soaping and dillydallying with the antiquated falsehoods that for so many centuries hav cursed mankind. Such lecturers should be upheld and sustained in every place, seeing that they, like Thomas Paine, labor to do away with, yes, kill, not prophets, popes, and priests, but the pernicious, absurd, misleading, mind-and-body-destroying principles that all priesthoods still are endeavoring to promulgate. That Brother Putnam, and especially now Dr. York, hav sown such seed in Utah as shall in time spring up and bear much good fruit, is not to be doubted. Well do I remember when Brigham Young said: "Let the Christians send us their priests and missionaries if they wish to convert us. We will all go and hear them!" Now, when Freethinkers propose to advocate their doctrins, it is: "Don't go and listen to them; don't argue with them; leave them to their darkness." O ye saviors on Mount Zion! Why do not you, like the only true messengers of God that you say you are, challenge and meet in public debate and discussion these Infidels that you simulate to so much despise? If God is with you, who can stand against you? One thing more. The Mormons ought never to complain of being excluded from participating in political matters in this country, their government being a kingdom established by God, ours a republic, a government of the people by the people. L. P. EDHOLM.

HAVANA, ILL., April 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. Worley finds fault with Colonel Ingersoll's doctrin, "We do as we must." He says he is sorry the colonel has drifted off into this untenable ground. I think Friend Worley needs sympathy worse than the colonel. Then he goes on to say that if this doctrin is true, the thief, the murderer, the cannibal, and assassin are all justified. If a man steals, he is not justified for stealing. He is only justified in doing as he must. But you will say, Could he not hav acted differently? No, he could not under the circumstances, because the temptation to steal was greater than the tendency not to steal. This being the case, how could he act otherwise? The murderer may be endowed with a large faculty of destructivness and small benevolence, and these leading traits in his character, with the general surroundings, may force him to kill one of his fellow-men, but he has only done as he must under the circumstances. The cannibal may eat one of his fellow-men, but if he does it will be because his desire for food was stronger than his power to resist. Then if the cannibal does that which he is forced to do, has he not done as he must?

Again, he says: If we do as we must, then law and government are useless. Law and government are not to prevent a person from doing as he must, but to prevent persons from doing those things which are considered wrong. Would Mr. Worley want to do away with insane asylums because insane people act as they must? Certainly not. We need asylums as long as we hav insane people. We need law and government just as long as we hav a class of people who need governing. We need jails and penitentiaries to hold the thief and murderer, not because he has done as he must, but because it is better for the world that he be restrained from stealing and murdering. We can dispense with jails and penitentiaries when all people get so good that they will not commit a crime. We can dispense with insane asylums when all mental diseases are healed.

Again, he says he cannot see any difference between Anarchism and "doing as you must." I understand Anarchy to mean a lawless condition without government. In doing as you must you sometimes do right and sometimes wrong. Now, if doing as you must is Anarchy, then good and bad things are Anarchism, but this, you see, cannot hav anything to do with Anarchism or any other ism. Even if we do as we must, then it is better to hav laws and government. I do not find any fault with a man because he does wrong, but I find fault with those things which cause him to do wrong. And it is Freethought and Rationalism to remove these causes and replace them with causes that will make people do good.

Now, Friend Worley, I hav no doubt you did as you must in opposing the colonel, but when we remove those causes that made you think as you did and replace them with better ones, I think you will agree with the colonel. Hoping you will get on the right track, I am,

Yours truly, J. A. WEABER.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., April 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I find in the last issue, April 14th, a letter from another Religio-Liberal. I mean one who professes to be Liberal. He even heads his article, "The Mission of Freethinkers." He says, "When we manifest sympathy with Anarchy, we weaken our cause." I do not claim to understand the true sense or teaching of those who advocate Anarchy. However, from the little insight I gain from some writers on the theory, I gather the idea that they do not teach the abolition of all laws—as Webster would hav us believe—but to abolish such as debar us from equal rights before the bar of justice. He adds, "Nothing is so damaging to our cause as to express sympathy with those murderers at Chicago." All the information I was able to gain of the Anarchist trial did not evince evidence to me that they committed murder. Thousands of others who probably investigated the case as closely as did Brother Chapin view it as no proof of murder. He also adds, "Let no one call these dastardly criminals martyrs." No one acquainted with the actions of the men hanged, wishing to do them justice, could call them dastards. Who can think a coward would hav come back as Parsons did and given himself up? But, alas! it was similar to the case of Servetus going to Calvin for protection, and walking into the nest of a vulture. And again he says, "We must not be ashamed of our convictions; we should remember that we are no longer rebels to ecclesiastical authority." If that is not confessing submission to the church, I know not the meaning of language. But the next sentence is somewhat ambiguous. He says, "but armed with the decree of science"—as though the decree of science and the ecclesiastical authority were in harmony. Well, I suppose he means Christian science, but many of us Liberals do not accept Christian science. He says, "The code of morals promulgated by Christ cannot be improved." That settles it. We as Liberals all along hav been recreant, inasmuch as we hav not accepted the Bible morals as a code that cannot be improved. There certainly needs to be an improvement on an endless hell—I mean, something worse—for such men as Brother Remsburg for writing the pamphlet, "Bible Morals," and satisfying so many of us poor, deluded Infidels that there can be a better code of morals than that found in the Bible. Mr. Chapin says we must not forget the man Christ. There are many of us who are not likely to after reading, among hundreds of other things, the following, "But those mine enemies which would not that I should reign over them bring hither and slay before me" (Luke xix, 27). He commanded murder; therefore that code of morals cannot be improved. "Whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come" (Matt. xii, 32). Jesus taught endless punishment, consequently it is a good moral doctrin, and of course we as Liberals should accept it or be damned. "For I come to set a man at variance against his father and the daughter against her mother" (Matt. x, 35)—beautiful morals! "If auy man come to me and hate not his father and mother and wife and children and brethren and sisters, yea and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 26). Who can reject such a moral code? None except Infidels.

In conclusion let me say to my friend Chapin that I emerged out of a faith in Christianity to my present status of mind, which is termed Infidelity; reading the Bible did it. I hold that we all form opinions from force of evidence, hence cannot control our belief; consequently I do not condemn you for differing with me. WM. A. THOMPSON.

MT. PLEASANT, TEX., April 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to ask G. A. Chapin to explain his "Mission of Freethinkers," that appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 14th. He says: "We must not be afraid of our convictions; we should remember that we are no longer rebels to ecclesiastical authority, but armed with the decrees of science." Has science decreed that man-made laws are based on justice? Does he not ask those who think we could get along better if nine-tenths of our laws were repealed to be afraid of their convictions when he says, "We must not lose our respect for government?" Does he not virtually say just what church and state despots hav always said, "You can think as you please so long as you think as we do?" "Mindful of the heroes who achieved our independence, we should let nothing dampen our patriotism or our zeal." For what—wrong government? If we are zealous aspirants for the freedom of mankind and the religion of humanity, how can we favor a despotic interference by church or state with the free exercise of our mind and body so long as we do not interfere with the rights of others? "When we manifest sympathy with Anarchy we weaken our cause." Has Freethought, after having struggled so long in the face of opposition, to fear "the powers that be" at this time and begin to court favor at the feet of Mother Grundy? "The American laborer has wrongs, but they must be righted through the processes of law, and not Anarchy and revolution." No doubt some Mr. Chapin said the same of the colonial fathers, but working on the basis that "our freedom must not go too far," or "that laws or governments must not be defied," never achieved the independence of America or any other nation, nor ever will. If Freethought should be afraid of anything, it should be afraid of forming a creed. It should be Liberal; and if I understand Liberalism, it means autonomy—Freethinking. It should not be expected that we can all grow in the same ratio. Some will always be a hundred years ahead, others nearly that far behind, the age in which they liv, especially under our present paternal systems. We should all be Liberal enough to allow all others the right to think and act as they please, so long as they do not interfere with the rights of others, even if it is in direct opposition to our preconceived ideas. Because "we hav the best government," is that any reason why we should not hav a better one, or none at all, if by so doing the happiness and freedom of the individual is enhanced?

Where does government get the right to control a man's actions so long as he does not interfere with some other person or property? Why should not the present marriage system be attacked, if "the decrees of science" tell us that "the marriage altar" and the slavery undergone as its sequel produce crime, misery, and want?

Mr. Chapin, I am afraid it will not be "policy" for Liberals to formulate a creed or to adopt one that has already been formulated. The better way will be to giv to all absolute freedom, and let right triumph, as it always does when it has an open field.

Human nature revolts when you try to control it by force, and it is well that it does, for to that spirit we owe what little freedom we hav. Let us accept the good in all things, not only in the teachings of Christ, but in those of the Anarchists, Socialists, and free lovers also.

May right triumph. E. E. PARK.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower.
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Wearing Out the Carpet.

At a boarding-house one summer lodged a widow and her child,
He a bright-eyed little fellow, full of fun and mischief wild.
Little Charley often wandered through the kitchen and the hall
And the dining-room and parlor, playing with his kite and ball.
He would tramp with heavy footsteps o'er the carpet on the floor,
Playing childlike, full of pleasure, as he roamed the cottage o'er;
But the mistress grew impatient, as in glee he would rejoice;
And she often checked his laughter with a harsh and rending voice.
One bright day the youngster, rambling, gaily passing off the hours,
Saw a butterfly and caught it from among the fragrant flowers.
Quite triumphant, with the captiv quick he ran across the floor,
But the ired landlady met him, as she oft had done before:
"Quit your running on the carpet! Don't you know you'll wear it out
With your heavy footsteps falling as you trample all about?
Go keep quiet, as I tell you! Little boys should not be heard!"
But his mother from her bedroom caught the sound of every word.
"Charley!" called she, feebly, faintly, for she sick and weary lay
In her bed that summer morning; "I hav something I would say."
And he, standing by his mother, heard her accents soft and low.
"Come, be quiet—mother's weary. Would you cause her tears to flow?
Bring your little chair, my boy; place it close beside my bed."
And he softly kissed his mother—"I will do as you hav said."
By her side he meekly cowered, vowing he would do his best.
But as soon as slumber's pinions gave his weary mother rest
He had grown impatient, restless, so he stole into the hall,
And was soon rebounding gaily with his bat and rubber ball.
Charley, can't you mind your elders?" screamed the fierce landlady wild,
As she ran from out the parlor; "What a vexing, noisy child!
Don't you know you'll ruin my carpet? You are such a bother here!"
And with crushed and fallen spirit, Charley wiped away a tear.
Mother, waking from her slumber, heard the words the lady said,
So with deepest grief and anguish soft she crept from out the bed,
And she, too, reproved her boy as she had not done before—
Told him of the pain he caused her with his loud and fierce uproar.
"Go, be seated now in silence," and she noticed with surprise
That the scalding, bitter teardrops trembled in his little eyes.
On his tiptoe little Charley walked in silence through the hall,
And in meek submission heeded to the faintest-echoed call.
On from then he gave no trouble, as he crept across the floor,
And the harsh landlady trembled for her carpet's sake no more.
Still when Charley heard her footsteps he would tremble with affright,
Dodging by the chairs or tables, hiding from her eagle sight.

When the glorious summer's sunshine faded into autumn's ray,
Little Charley, flushed with fever, in a darkened bedroom lay;
And his patient, tired mother, bending o'er him as he slept,
Caught the quick, hot breath of fever, and in silent anguish wept.
Hours and days increased the fever which with such a deadly clasp
Held the little wasting figure in its burning, scorching grasp.
Mother's hope was fading dimmer, mother's eyes were filled with tears,
When she called the same landlady, telling all her inmost fears:
"Come, I beg you, see my darling. He is, oh, so ill to-day!"
And they both stood by the bedside where the fevered victim lay.
Trembling with the keenest anguish, then the pale landlady said,
As she smoothed the rumpled pillow under Charley's burning head:
"I am sorry, oh, so sorry, that my little boy is ill!
How I miss your merry laughter! How I wish that you were well!"
With her sad eyes fixed upon him noticed she a wild surprise,
With a strangely searching luster sparkling in his sunken eyes.
And she bent to hear the whisper which he spoke so firm and slow:
While he gasped for breath to tell it, with his fevered face aglow:
"I shall never try your patience with my merry laugh again,
And I ne'er shall tear the carpet which has caused you so much pain."
Not the deadly, cruel arrow which has pierced the happy birds
Ever gave the thrilling anguish following his looks and words.
As if stung by hidden vipers, low she bowed her throbbing head,
And his pillow soon was dampened with tears that she had shed.
But at last she spoke more plainly, as she checked the falling tear:
"Are you going home to heaven when you leave this earthly sphere?"
"No," he sighed. The cold drops glistened on his brow so smooth and fair.
"Angels, too, will think me noisy, and I cannot enter there."
Like an echo still resounding rang the last faint words he said.
One more struggle and a murmur, and the little boy was dead. DARLINA BELL.

Correspondence.

MOODY, TEX., April 29, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines, as this is the first time. I went to hear preaching this morning, and the preacher said that the grave was hell, but hell-fire was a lake of fire and brimstone. I am fourteen. The last two weeks of our school was writing and arithmetic. I hav five brothers and four sisters. It rained a hard shower Saturday morning. I will close for this time. Yours truly,

WILLIAM A. SIMMONS.

MOODY, TEX., April 29, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I wrote a letter for the Corner. I am twelve years old. I do not go to school now. I study arithmetic and reading. We had an Infidel school-teacher; his name was Meyers. I was down to a Methodist meeting about two weeks ago. I was to see one of my Liberal friends to-day. There are not many Liberals around here. I think the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER are real nice. I would like to hav some Liberal girl about my age write to me. Your Liberal friend,

DESSIE LEWETTA SIMMONS.

TYNDALL, DAK., April 22, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: THE TRUTH SEEKER has been a weekly visitor to our household for nearly two years. During all that time I hav never once written to the Children's Corner.

I hav never seen that any children write to the Children's Corner from Dakota. I know I am the first one from Tyndall, and I hope I will not be the last. I was very sorry to hear of your affliction; I think it must be very hard to lose one's mother. We all like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much.

One of our horses died last week; one that had served us faithfully for many years. This will be the only obituary the poor thing will hav. Well, I do not wish you to get tired of me the first time, so I will bring my letter to a close.

Trusting that you are in good health, and that THE TRUTH SEEKER may continue to prosper, I remain, Yours truly,

FELICIA B. RICHMOND.

Georgie's Cold.

Georgie comes down to breakfast with a swollen visage. Whereupon mamma says to the four-year-older: "Why, Georgie darling, don't you feel well? Tell mamma what the matter is."

Georgie, full of influenza, replies: "No, I don't feel well. Bofe of my eyes is leakin', and one of my noses don't go."

Henry Bergh.

This was the philanthropist who devoted his life to preventing cruelty to animals. The Omaha World has the following bit of pleasantry about him:

St. Peter: "What name?"

New spirit: "Henry Bergh."

"I hav heard of you. You devoted your life to the protection of dumb beasts against human beasts?"

"Yes."

"And you were the first man to do such a thing in a Christian country?"

"It is so."

"This heaven is not a good enough place for you, Henry Bergh; you deserve a better reward than a heavy crown and a twanging harp. Step into the balloon, and ascend to the Elysian fields prepared for the gentle, tender-hearted pagans who never yet voluntarily stepped on an ant-hill."

A YOUNG lady writing about the revision of the New Testament says that the phrase, "purple and fine linen," conveys no idea of luxury to her mind, and she suggests, as an improvement, "sealskin and black velvet."

Science Column.

Quartz, and Other Crystals.

"Crystal" comes from a Greek word, and means ice, because crystals are clear like pure ice. Ice is but a large number of crystals massed into a solid substance. The snow falls in beautiful crystals. The quarries, caverns, and deep, rocky ravines all show many varieties of crystals in cube, prism, and other forms; for all the rocks, the granit, marble, iron, lead, and indeed all the solid parts of the earth, are composed of crystals. Precious jewels are crystalline. The diamond is only pure charcoal that has become, by the forces of nature, crystallized.

We walk above a beautiful wonderland, surpassing in magnificence the stories of the "Arabian Nights" or the marvelous tales of the "city of the New Jerusalem." The dust we tread, the air we breathe, is full of crystal loveliness. We hav but to open our eyes and behold a vast sea of beauty, in form, color, and order, all around us. As a rule, we go blindfold through a world throbbing with life, energy, and pulsing grandeur in many endless forms.

Quartz, or rock crystals, is extremely interesting, and quite common. Of course, you know a crystal is a cluster of particles all of the same shape. You would hardly believe it possible that nature could fashion a crystal so perfect as it is. But it is true. Quartz rock presents a subject for study and research most fascinating. Its crystals are six-sided, ending in as many triangles; that, in geometry, we would call a hexagon, and, when perfect, we would say it has the hexagonal pyramid on either end. When first taken from the earth quartz is dirty-looking, because covered with clay, but when this is removed the crystals are marvels of prismatic clearness. A large number are often bedded together. Some of the clearest are called "California" and "Lake George" diamonds. The people of olden times believed that quartz crystals were clear water that God had made into ice that it was impossible to melt. They called them "krustalles," which means ice, as was mentioned at the beginning of this lesson. Hence the name crystal.

Generally quartz crystals are found in limestone quarries in masses, sometimes regular and at other times irregular in shape. Quartz is very hard, and is used for spectacles, when they are called Brazilian pebbles, from a kind of quartz said to be obtained from Brazil.

Crystals obey a law of their being in form, growth, and change; each little crystal has its own line of development. Thus, the difference between real butter and oleomargarine can always be detected by the difference in formation of their crystals, as oleomargarine cannot take on the form of real butter by any process, in its crystals. Salt and sugar are but masses of crystals.

Heat, light, and chemical change are all necessary in the making of crystals, whether formed artificially or by nature. The crystals in the rocks and metals plainly show the great heat to which the earth was once subjected in process of growth.

You may experiment with crystals and find much amusement by so doing. Take, for instance, crude camphor, melt it by slow heat, and you can see the crystals form in beautiful designs. Under the microscope they present a lovely appearance. Sea water, slowly evaporated, first givs out gypsum, then common salt, and then magnesian salts, all in crystals. By long continued heat, deposits of earth can be changed into gneiss and mica schist.

There is a kind of crystal called "asbestos," or in other words, "mineral wool." Thousands of fine threads are massed in these crystals, which are found in the rocks of the earth. Asbestos will not burn, therefore it is found useful for many purposes. Safes are lined with it and thus made fireproof, and the roofs of buildings are protected by it when it is made into a kind of paint. The Romans were aware of the nature of asbestos, and used it for various purposes, especially for towels and table napkins. It saved washing, for when the napkins and towels required cleaning, they were thrown into the fire and came out of it clean and nice, and ready for use again.

Some one has called crystals the "flowers of the mineral world." The name is appropriate, and the study of these flowers is a real pleasure.

All the domain of nature is a great book from which one may gather many lessons, and always a vast amount of useful information as well as profitable entertainment.

There are indeed "sermons in stones, books in the running brooks," if one would only stop to read them.

Do crystals grow?

Why, yes; we cannot see them grow, but they increase in size and change by various agencies.

Linnæus, the great naturalist, said: "Stones grow; plants grow and feel; animals grow, feel, and move."

Thus is shown the difference between the three great kingdoms of nature. S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—From what is the word crystal derived? Where may be found many varieties of crystals? What is the diamond? Where is Wonderland? What is a crystal? Tell about quartz crystals. What is the "California" and "Lake George" diamond? What did people of old times think about crystals? Where are rock crystals found usually? For what purpose is quartz used? How is the difference between butter and oleomargarine detected? What is salt? sugar? How are crystals formed? How can you experiment with crystals? State what you know of "asbestos." What did the Romans use it for? What are crystals often called? What is the entire domain of nature? Do crystals grow? Who was Linnæus? What did he say of the three kingdoms of nature?

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.
A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.
Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.
For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

Religious Problems.

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

Boomtown.

From the Chicago News.

Boom?
Well, I should smile!
Why, mister, just you take a walk around
And see the new improvements going on.
Ef I do say't, ther ain't another town
In the Northwest 'at holds a candle to us.
Steam cars? Oh, no; this is our street-car track.
We put it in last spring, an' I suppose
It's worth a hundred thousand to the town.
Ride? Er—well, no; the mud's so all-fired deep
On the next street that traffic is suspended.
Pay? What, the line? Well, scarcely yet;
But then, you see, the stock is all placed East,
An' as we gin a ten years' franchise with it
They can afford to wait for dividends.
Good water here? Oh, yes, the finest works
West o' St. Paul; cost fifty thousand easy.
Drink it? Well, no; not now. The people here
In some way took a prejudice agin it,
Account o' undertakers bein' kept so busy.
Railroads? Leading center in the West, sir,
With three more roads a-coming in the fall.
'Twere on'y a week ago our board o' trade
Voted 'em fifty thousand dollars each.
Big bonus? Pshaw! Why, we can save
As much again first year, on fuel alone.
Taxes? Well, yes; they are a little steep;
But then to dance you hav to pay the fiddler,
An' boom we must, or else throw up our hands.
Town healthy? Finest in the land, sir!
Good sewerage system? Well, the fact is, mister,
We've been so thundering busy, working booms,
That has been overlooked; an' then, you see,
'Twould cost a tidy sum, an' wouldn't show;
So for a while, I guess, we'll do without.
Let go a road or two? Why, see here, man,
You must be joking. Boomtown couldn't do it!
But there's our public park, just north o' town,
For rest an' recreation, an' we've spent
A pile o' money putting in improvements—
Set out a thousand shade-trees there this spring.
How far? Why, just a mile or so right up that hill,
Near Jenkins's fourth addition to the town.
Old Jenkins was a ripper. He gin the block
To Boomtown for a park, and sold his lots
Soon's the council took it off'n his hands.
But lemme tell you, mister, that ther park
Is bound to be immensely popular
Soon as we get the cable cars to running.
Good water power? Well, now you've struck it sure;
None better in the country, 'cept Niagry, p'raps.
Mills running? Yes—no, not this week;
Water's a trifle low, somehow, this summer,
An' for a week or so the mill's shut down.
Good business done? Well, now you're shouting, mister;
Merchants just drove to death, an' making money
Hand over fist. What's that? That bell?
Oh, yes; I clean forgot. Poor Jones! His stock
Is going off at auction—sheriff closed him up
Two days ago. Fact is, he trusted right and left
An' did a rattling trade, but got no cash;
So when his bills fell due poor Jones lay down.
Hard luck? You bet; but just what he expected.
Eh? What's that? Why don't the people pay
For what they buy? Why, mister, all they hav
And all they get is put in real estate.
Sell out and pay their debts? Yes, mebbe so,
But then, they're waiting for the boom to strike.
What's that you say? You guess you won't invest?
And after all I've showed you of the town?
Well, burn my buttons, but you Eastern chaps
Are mighty cur'os critters. Well, take this map
And read these pamphlets while you're on the train.
Mebbe you'll change your mind. Say, here's my card:
"Augustus Shark, Dealer in Real Estate, Boomtown."
Just drop a line if you conclude to buy. Good day.

A Basket of Chips.

PIOUS AS THE DEVIL.

Yes, and why not pious as the devil?

Did not the devil pray? and did he not earnestly pray? and did he not pray the prayer of faith? and was not his prayer directly answered?

When? Where? How?

When he went into that Jumbo prayer-meeting where the sons of God were assembled before the Lord. Satan came also and besought that he might afflict Job. The devil then got the drop on God and obliged him to go back on his best friend just to show the devil that the poor man had sand. If God had not done that, the devil would hav bothered the blustering old God out of his senses about it.

POPE'S GOD.

All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body nature is, and God the soul.

Pope makes his God to be the great first cause, and so we must suppose, according to Popeism, that nature, God's body, was exhaled from himself somewhat as the shell is by the snail. This comparison is most appropriate because it took God an eternally long while to work out a body. Nature being made up of distinct materials, portions, and individualities, to complete the analogy, God, the soul, must be also a composit of all spiritual beings, and, therefore, no more a person than is nature, the body.

THE CORRELATION OF ANTAGONISTS.

All the churches are in the same boat, for they are alike in principle, however they may differ in particulars. But that principle is not one of unity, but of discord, as it is the prime tenet of each church that the church itself is the court of doctrin and disciplin, to which the members must yield both sentiment and reason. The claim of submitting to the Bible amounts to nothing, as each church cooks up its Bible to its own taste, and damns the individual as a perverter of God's word who culls and seasons his dish to suit himself. Implicit faith in dogmatic assertion and servil obedience to arbitrary authority is the ecclesiastical requisit to fellowship and salvation.

MUCH MUDDLED.

Genesis says that on the first day of creation "God said, Let there be light, and there was light;" and that "God divided the light from the darkness." What fellowship had the light with the darkness, that it needed to be divided? Where light is, there darkness cannot be. Yet after God got it so nicely separated, and puttered along for three days more raising fish and poultry, Genesis says he on the fourth day made "two great lights, one to rule the day and one to rule the night, and to divide the light from the darkness." How was it that God had to divide the light from the darkness by means of the sun and moon if he had already hocuspocused a divorcement? Until God had completed creation, how was it that the things he had made did not fly to pieces again for want of their supplements?

FAITH AND FUNGUS.

Superstitious faith is the sodden fungus which grows and rots in the swamps of fear.

The sunshine of hope yields fragrant blossom and luscious fruitage in the fields of reason.

Religion is natural, just as any other folly is natural—as disease is natural, as insanity is natural, as crime is natural.

The word religion should be expunged from the Freethinkers' vocabulary. If the word denotes relationship to deity, it is nil, as deity is not. God has no definition, and therefore can hav no expressible relativity. If religion is sometimes used to signify anything rational, then supply another word. If we hav no word comprehensiv enough, then make one; religion comprehends too many bad things, too many vague notions and fraudulent pretensions, and is, therefore, not serviceable to name definit facts and honest intentions.

TARIFF TINKERING.

I hav been thinking of hammering some of THE TRUTH SEEKER's tariff deformers, but don't think it worth the trouble. I do not know any reason why a Freethinker should be a consummate fool and commit suicide, and, therefore, cannot see any sense in an American being a free trader and thus abolishing his own occupation. JOHN P. GUILD.

Lowell, Mass.

A Jew's Experience at the Revival Jubilee.

From the Hebrew Standard.

Having been christened among our downtown brethren as an Infidel and apikoros, I resolved to try the revivalists to see what they could do for me. Accordingly, last Friday night, after making kidush and partaking of a plateful of stewed pike (hecht), I repaired to the Jane street church. Reaching my destination, I was soon hemmed in by a solid mass of humanity, consisting of sweet-faced young ladies, with still sweeter voices. I began to realize the beauty of conversion, but when pushed by the crowd and suddenly brought face to face with a swarthy daughter of Ham, black as the ace of spades, my chances for conversion were on the ebb. Finally, I was pushed in front of the altar. The surrounding enthusiasm moved me to prayers. I offered up a fervent prayer for more consistency among our rabbis and editors. I also prayed for the increase in circulation of our English Jewish weeklies and the annihilation of our Jargon publications. A special prayer I sent up for the coming chief rabbi. But when attempting to pray for my own salvation I became as dumb as an oyster and not a cent's worth of prayer could I raise. My embarrassment being noticed by one of the elders with a billiard-ball cranium, and hoarse as a cracked church bell, he began:

"My brother, allow me to offer you assistance in your hard struggle. Would you like to be converted?"

"I don't mind if I do."

"Glory, hallelujah!" came from a chorus of hoarse voices, and the signal for prayer was given.

"Hold on, gentlemen. This is not an appropriation bill in the legislature, to be railroaded through. I want to look before I leap."

"Don't you want to go to heaven?"

"Not this eve, some other eve. Besides, you Christian folk hav so many ways to reach heaven that a man is sure to lose his way. A friend of mine, a Catholic by belief, displayed a map which he assured me is the only genuin one in existence, and told me emphatically that the only direct road to that celestial abode is, first, to fix my belief in the infallibility of a certain old gentleman, then to be led by a young lady. Another friend, calling himself Protestant, laughed at the absurdity of a human being's claim to be infallible, and at one's entrusting himself to be guided by a woman. The surest and shortest way is when led by the son of that woman whom he ridiculed. Still another, who is neither Catholic, Protestant, Jew, nor Christian, but a converted paid missionary to the Jews, told me sagely that his method of reaching heaven is patented, and has no equal on earth, i. e., greenbacks. Your way, again, is to regale myself with a piece of jubilee cake, then to contribute to the $100 weekly salary of the boy preacher, Harrison, and I am in heaven already. I therefore reason thus: Since the body is certainly left on earth after death, it should be assigned as the heaven while alive. As for the soul, I entrust it to its spiritual maker, the only one father in heaven—who is single, consequently could hav no son."

"But ain't you a Christian?"

"No."

"Ain't you aware that the Jews crucified Christ?"

"My friend, you certainly hav the advantage over me. I am a full-blooded Jew from head to foot, and am entirely ignorant of the whole proceeding."

"What will become of the prophecies in the New bearing upon those of the Old Testament?"

"You ought to be silent on that point. But since you broached the subject, I will call your attention to the difference existing between the prophecies of the Old and the New Testament. In the former everything was predicted before the event took place. God promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob to multiply their seed, the same to be enslaved and redeemed. At the thorn-bush scene we read: 'Certainly I will be with thee. And this shall be a token unto thee that I hav sent thee, when thou hast brought out this people from Egypt, ye shall serve God upon this mountain' (Ex. iii, 12). The prophecies of Moses, Joshua, and Samuel, which were predicted centuries ahead of their realization, were verified by undeniable, living proofs. But the fulfilment of the prophecies in the New Testament was just the reverse. Every occurrence from the birth of Christ to the casting of lots about his garments after the crucifixion is attributed to prophecies preceding the events. Even the poor ass was seized upon in accordance with a previous prophecy. Anybody could shape and fit his actions so as to correspond with the doings and sayings of the past. But for argument's sake let us admit that the entire New Testament is bearing upon the prophecies of the Old. If so, I fail to see the reason for the grudge Christians bear toward the Jew for having crucified Christ. To the contrary, it ought to be perpetually jubilant and exalt the Jew for carrying out the predestined will of God so as to cement the Old and the New Bible. Had the Jew failed to carry out God's design and permitted Christ to die of old age, neither the New Testament nor to-night's jubilee would exist."

My friend the elder vainly scratched his head, as not a sign of hair was anywhere visible. Mustering courage, he exclaimed, "How would you account for Israel's dispersion and sufferings ever since the Calvary tragedy?"

"Easily enough. The all-wise father, in order to demonstrate his promis to Father Abraham that through his seed all nations shall be blessed, saw how the confinement to Palestine was too narrow a field for Israel to carry on its mission. Its commonwealth was therefore destroyed, not by Christians, but by the heathens, and the Jew was driven out to the four corners of the earth as missionary to the world. But their small number was inadequate to their task. Therefore providence assigned to them Christianity, as an auxiliary, but instead of acting as an ally, Christianity, like a hungry wolf upon a defenseless sheep, fell upon the Jew, taking a Jewess for a mother and a Jew for a son, appropriating all the dead heroes of Israel as typical Christians. The balance of the live Jews were utilized as kindling-wood for the perpetual fires upon the altar of the Inquisition. The Jew, instead of becoming discouraged, danced to death, proclaiming: You could burn my body, but my spirit lived, livs, and will liv. Its fulfilment need not be portrayed, as it is a living fact.

"Christianity as a last effort deprived the Jew of all legitimate traffic, branded him as a trader who will do anything for money. But was that accusation substantiated? Look how the millions spent for the conversion of the Jew proved to be miserable failures. Never was the Jew more powerful in numbers and influence than he is to-day. In the metropolis of this glorious country, the Christian clergy, catching at a straw, got hold of an ignorant tramp, a self-styled son of a rabbi, who cleans, scours, and makes the old Jewish soul equal to new for so much. With what result? Not only do I scorn his proffered $10 greenback, but I am willing to pay a hundredfold to the treasury of any Christian charity for the privilege of proving the inconsistency of that latter-day St. Paul. But the Christian clergy seem to be rather silent on that point."

My would-be godfather the elder, becoming unnaturally red in the face, blurted out: "You are an unmistakable Infidel. Not only am I satisfied of never making a convert out of you, but I am in danger of being influenced by your poisonous virus."

"My friend, I was under the impression that this revival is for the sole purpose of converting Infidels to Christianity. Pray, how many Infidels are there among the one thousand converts that are now jubileeing?"

"All I hav to say is that you are an Infidel lacking Christian faith."

"My Christian believer, you would better not use the term faith, as I hav something to say about this very faith business. I hav studied the New Testament in Hebrew, Russian, German, and English, and they all agree upon the passage: 'For verily I say unto you, if ye hav faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto the mountain: Remove hence to the yonder place, and it shall remove, and nothing shall be impossible unto you.' As a monopolizer of faith, how many mountains hav you ever removed? What makes you lock up your valuables in a burglar-proof safe and not use faith as a substitute? Nay, last Wednesday in the midst of the jubilee over one thousand faithful converts to Christianity, Dr. Harrower, pastor of the church, warned the faithful congregation in the following words: 'If you hav occasion to change your seats, take your wraps, overcoats, and rubber shoes with you. Two overcoats hav been stolen from the very vicinity of the altar.' If such be faith, I will hav none of it. Since you are so proud of your faith, what need hav we for one of the finest police forces? In my lack of faith I observed that when the criminal, who is invariably of the faithful Christian type, is caught by one of the finest, he convinces his man not by faith but by a locust. After conviction, instead of the criminal being sent to a church and left to his faith, he is confined in a padded cell in the penitentiary. Even the boodle aldermen, bank presidents, cashiers, and bribers, all high church dignitaries, who placed too much faith in the almighty dollar, are now converted into faithful laundrymen, shoemakers, minus faithful Christians. But they who eluded the law, instead of trusting to Christianity took refuge in faithless Canada."

"Get thee hence, Satan!" shouted my elder; "not only are you a plain Infidel, but a dangerous one as well."

"My faithful friend," I mildly replied, "I am a Hebrew, and I fear the Lord, the God of heaven, which hath made the sea and dry land. You will find me no missionary trying to proselytize you. To the contrary, we Jews adhere to the last prophet, Malachi: 'Hav we not all one father? Hath not one God created us?' Besides, our sages assert, 'Proselytes to Israel are like leprosy.' But since Christianity teaches you to christen me Infidel, allow me to impart to you an Infidel's advice. Accept the truth, from whomsoever it comes. In order to make your conversion a success, so Jew, gentile, and Infidel will join your forces, endeavor to save the soul through the body, not the body through the soul. Do not convert your church into bedlam. Should Christ himself appear upon this scene, he would repeat the words: 'Father, forgiv them, for they know not what they do.' Convert the ministers into men, not into hypocrits. Convert your own inclination and try to befriend the friendless. Let the ministers of the gospel convert their preaching into action. Convert the money spent upon temperance into educational purposes. Take a lesson from the unconverted Jew who, with out societies and pledge-signing, knows how to indulge. He uses, but not abuses, his privilege. In short, convert yourself into a rational being, not, as at present, a fit candidate for Bloomingdale."

"Get thee hence, Satan—get!"

And I "got."

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

THE MERCY SEAT.

And the cherubims shall stretch forth their wings on high, covering the mercy-seat with their wings, and their faces shall look one to another; toward the mercy-seat shall the faces of the cherubims be.—Ex. xxv, 20.

Gems of Thought.

FOR the vagaries of the clouds the Infidels propose to substitute the realities of earth; for superstition, the splendid demonstrations and achievements of science; and for theological tyranny, the chainless liberty of thought.—Ingersoll.

THE orthodox remedy for evil is so well known that it seems superfluous to state it here. That it is a system built up by the human mind, there is no doubt. It is a direct outcome of the principle of force—of the right of the strong over the weak. Man, a vile creature, is so offensiv to his creator that that creator will punish him in everlasting fire. Those who believe that God's own son satisfied his [God the father's] anger and took the punishment, will be saved, and no other. The preachers coolly tell us that no one will go to hell unless he has a mind to. But common sense tells us that no one will go to hell unless somebody puts him there.—J. E. Peck.

THERE is a set of ecclesiastics who will not read a book or newspaper and who will not argue with anyone who does not reflect their own sentiments. They look into the glass and say, "I see every time I look there one who always agrees with me." That is their whole world, and of the rest they are profoundly ignorant.—Norman Macleod, D.D.

IT was upon the vote of such as Athanasius that the New Testament was decreed to be "the word of God:" and nothing can present to us a more strange idea than that of decreeing the word of God by vote. Those who rest their faith on such authority put man in the place of God, and hav no foundation for future happiness. Credulity, however, is not a crime, but it becomes criminal by resisting conviction. It is strangling in the womb of the conscience the efforts which it makes to ascertain truth. We should never force belief upon ourselvs in anything.—Paine.

To reject a truth is but to defraud ourselvs. If it is truth, it must be God's truth and therefore sacred; and we incur greater danger in rejecting the general verdict of science than by devoutly accepting the same. At all hazards, we must squarely and manfully look the truth in the face and not try to substitute wry faces and hard names for argument, for to know the truth, and the whole truth, is man's most sacred duty and highest religion.—R. S. Brigham, M.D.

THE oracles are dumb;
No voice or hideous hum
Runs through the arched roof in words deceiving.
Apollo from his shrine
Can no more divine,
With hollow shriek the steep of Delphos leaving.
No nightly trance or breathed spell
Inspires the pale-eyed priest from the prophetic cell. —Milton.

ALL of us are impelled and carried along to the love and knowledge of learning, in which we account it glorious to excel, but consider every slip, mistake, ignorance, and deception to be hurtful and shameful. In this pursuit, which is both natural and virtuous, two faults are to be avoided. The first is the regarding things which we do not know as if they were understood by us and thence rashly giving them our assent. And he that wishes, as every man ought to wish, to avoid this error, must devote both his time and his industry to the study of things. The other fault is that some people bestow too much study and pains on things that are obscure, difficult, and even immaterial in themselvs. When these faults are avoided, all the pains and care a man bestows upon studies that are virtuous in themselvs, and worthy of his knowledge, will be deservedly commended. —Cicero.

THE highest perfection of human reason is to know that there is an infinity of truth beyond its reach.—Pascal.

MAY we not say that the hour of spiritual enfranchisment is even this? When your ideal world, wherein the whole man has been dimly struggling and inexpressibly languishing to work, becomes revealed and thrown open; and you discover with amazement enough, like the Lothario in "Wilhelm Meister," "America is here or nowhere." The situation that has not its duty, its ideal, has never yet been occupied by man. Yes, here, in this poor, miserable, hampered, despicable, actual life, wherein thou now standest, here or nowhere, is thy ideal: work it out thyself, and, working, believe, liv, and be free.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

THE god Wish is not the true god!—Carlyle.

WE recognize the importance of correct opinions, and we labor to discover and advance the truth, but we as little think of condemning men for their honest opinions as we do of blaming them for their complexion or their nationality. If wrong opinions lead to acts that are in violation of the law, society, to protect itself, may punish the offender for the acts, but not for his abstract beliefs, whatever they may be.—B. F. Underwood.

Odds and Ends.

ONE swallow does not make a summer, but it may hav occurred to you that one grasshopper makes more than a dozen springs.

SHE: "Darling, do you love me?" He (kissing her rapturously and repeatedly): "Do I? I wish you were a two-headed girl. That's all I can say!"

MISS A.: "I find your friend quite entertaining—when he forgets himself. Is he an American or an Englishman?" Mr. B.: "Neither. He's a Bostonian."

THE true meaning of the Woman Suffrage movement is very easy to see. Woman wants to be first in war, as well as first in peace and first in the hearts of her countrymen.

ELDER JONES: "Well, Brother Smith, how many hav you in your church?" Elder Smith: "Oh, two hundred and some odd. How many hav you?" Elder Jones: "Two hundred and all odd."

"THE penny's mighty," quoted the tramp, as he pleaded for the price of a night's lodging. "Guess the sward will do you to-night," growled the unpoetic Bobley, as he vanished in the gathering dusk.

THE maiden has doffed her seal sacque,
For the bright days of spring hav come bacque,
And she wants papa's checque,
Her person to decque,
If his funds will sustain the attacque.

REPORTER (to servant): "I want to ask Mr. Rutherford B. Hayes if he intends to present Mr. Sherman's name before the Chicago convention." Servant: "Misther Hayes, sorr, is a-feedin' the chickens, an' can't be disthoorbed."

AN unpopular youth of Cologne
With a pain in his stomach did mogne;
He heaved a great sigh
And said, "I would digh,
But the loss would be only my ogne."

DEACON'S wife (in church, nudging her husband): "John, rouse yourself; the minister has got to the 'one word more and I am done.'" Deacon (in an impatient whisper): "What do you want to disturb me for when the sermon isn't half over?"

"DEAR me!" said the little Boston boy, after intellectual suasion had failed, and they had spanked him for the first time; "if I had had the slightest suspicion that the resultant sensation was so poignant, I should never hav invited the experiment."

REPORTER (to assistant editor): "Can you chip in something toward burying the proofreader? He died without a cent." Assistant editor: "How much do you want me to giv?" "One dollar." "Well, there are two dollars: bury him one dollar's worth deeper."

VISITOR (to convict): "I s'pose they treat you well here, my friend?" Convict: "Yes, sir; I hav no complaints to make; but there is one thing I don't like. Every Sunday mornin' in the chapel, they set me next to one of these 'ere shoutin' Methodists, an' t'ain't pleasant fer a man wot was born an' brought up a 'Piscopalian."

"CHARLES," said his fond wife, as she appeared at the bedside, "aren't you ashamed to lie there at this hour on a Sunday morning?" "Well, my dear," he replied as he very langnidly opened one eye and let it softly close again, "I do feel mortified; but I hope to sleep it off before you get back from church."

WHATEVER a man's personal follies may be, he never succeeds in showing the depths of idiocy to which he can descend until he tries to run the universe for other people. Should this remark hit anybody very hard, he can pitch it at the members of some opposition society, union, or ism. The key fits any watch.

FIRST Irishman: "It's all pinsion, pinsion, nowadays, Moike. The paper says, there's a thousand survivors of the Mexican War, with twelve thousand widdies, afther drawin' pinsions this blessed day!" Second Irishman: "The owld Mormons! Twelve widdies to ivery one o' them! That's pfwhat becomes uv the surplush!"

"AH, my dear brother," said the minister to his unregenerate parishioner, "I hav talked to you many, many times, but to-day I come to ask you directly to be a Christian." "Um—er—er," replied the parishioner, "I'm very sorry, Mr. Textor, but you see, this is house-cleaning week, and really you are asking too much. Come around later."

"Now, parson," remarked the deacon of a Leadville, Col., church to the newly installed minister, "a hint between friends never hurt nobody, and you don't want to forget to remember that your predecessor died of on-wee." "Of ennui?" repeated the divine interrogativly. "Yas, of on-wee. It generally sets in, with this congregation, 'long about the end of the first half-hour of the sermon, and the symptoms are mighty sudden. Now go ahead with the ceremonies, and don't you forget that Quarterstretch Jake is holding the time on you in that off corner there under the gallery."

LESSON I.—"Does the man drive fast?" "Yes, very fast." "Why does the man drive fast?" "Because he is a new doctor in town and wants the public to think he has been sent for in a very important case." "And will the public think so?" "No, my son. Everybody has been onto that game for ten years past." LESSON II.—"Do you see the crowd?" "Yes; it is a fine crowd." "Hav these men escaped from state prison?" "Oh, no; they hav met to hold a ward caucus." "And why do they giv that pale-faced man the grand bounce?" "Because he is a crank. He came down from the upper end of the ward intending to vote as he pleased." "And won't they let him?" "Not much! The nomination was all cut and dried a month ago, and anyone who tries to oppose it will get his head punched." "Is this a free country?" "The freest on earth."

GEOLOGY AND GENESIS.—A MISFIT IN THE RECORDS.

Notes and Clippings.

NEW YORK had three great political conventions last week—Republican, Democratic, and Methodist.—Philadelphia Enquirer.

A JERUSALEM correspondent writes that the Holy City is fast becoming again the city of the Jews. In 1880 there were not more than 5,000 Jews there; now there are more than 30,000. Recent Russian persecutions hav led thousands to make their homes there, and although the Turkish government forbids all Jews who are not residents of Jerusalem to remain longer than thirty days, yet a judicious application of bribes enables them to stay there as long as they please without molestation. Wealthy Jews hav built hospitals and founded homes, and many of the refugees who are poor liv from the charity of their brethren.

Two years ago no paper in Massachusetts was so offensiv in its denunciation of Mr. Bradlaugh as the Worcester Spy. Now it says: "Only a few years ago Mr. Bradlaugh was contemptuously refused a seat in the British Parliament, and turned over to a policeman when he insisted upon his right to a seat and the right of his constituents, the electors of Northampton, to be represented in the House of Commons. He was generally denounced as a coarse and blatant demagog, more offensiv than other demagogs because he made a trade of blasphemy. By his own resolute tenacity, and the fidelity of his constituents, the House was at last forced to admit him, and he has since compelled respect by the frequent display of his power as a debater." It appears by this that others besides members of Parliament hav been forced to respect Mr. Bradlaugh's ability and courage.

THE Roman Catholic priests of the Argentine Republic are said to be on strike. The government issued an order lowering the rates for masses, marriages, burials, and other ecclesiastical functions, and the priests determined to resist this encroachment upon their income and prerogativs, so the churches all through the republic are closed, and even the ringing of the bells is stopped.

THE Springfield Republican in commenting upon the exclusion of the women from the Methodist general conference says: "If it is a bit more illiberal for the South Carolina Episcopalians to object to the admission of negroes to the diocesan convention than for the Methodists to fight against the admission of women to the general conference, the arguments before the latter body do not show it. The logic of the male-clad Methodists is deplorable." The Kansas City Times takes a humorous view of the matter, but nevertheless voices a great truth: "While it is decreed that the women may not discuss church matters at conferences, it is understood that they can keep right on doing the greater part of the praying and church-going. Nothing small about men when it comes down to the question, Who shall represent the family at church?" The Morristown Herald also sees grave dangers to the church in pursuing its policy of exclusion: "If these Methodist ministers who want to keep women out of their conference in New York were to also exclude the fair sex from their church meetings, what would become of the strawberry festival? And about how many young men would listen to their sermons? Brethren, without women church worship would fall into in——us d——e."

SAM JONES and Sam Small hav just concluded a revival effort at St. Louis. Their sermons were pronounced offensivly slangy, and much indignation was expressed by large numbers of people. The Rev. H. W. Williams, editor of the Central Baptist, said: "I hav gone to hear Sam Jones for the last time. When he made that remark about 'loping through hell,' it was all I could do to keep from taking my hat and leaving in mortification and disgust. If the local option cause is going to be run that way, I'm out of it. I can not stand this irreverence and vulgarity. If any man should come into my office and speak as Jones did yesterday, I'd feel like throwing him into the street. I am firmly convinced that if any other preacher than Sam Jones should use such language in St. Louis he would be kicked out of town, and that is what should be done with Jones."

THREE labor parties held national conventions last week at Cincinnati, endeavoring to combine. They were the Union Labor party, the United Labor party, and the Greenback Labor party. After two or three days of disagreement, they failed to combine either upon a platform or a presidential nomination, and there are likely to be three labor candidates set up. The Union Labor party's candidate for president of the United States is Andrew Jackson Streeter, of Illinois, the founder of the Farmers' Alliance, which has a membership of a million and a half. The United Labor party's candidate is Robert H. Cowdry, of Illinois, whose fame is narrower than that of his rival. The Greenback Labor party adjourned without nominating a candidate. The three party conventions could not agree upon a platform any more than upon a candidate, one of them standing for unmingled Greenbackism, another for Henry George's land tax, and the other for various theories. Henry George was with none of them, as he will support Cleveland if that gentleman is nominated by the Democracy.

THE New Jersey court of chancery last week rendered a decision which deprives Henry George, the land agitator, of a bequest of property aggregating in value about $10,000. It had been bequeathed by William Hutchings, who recently died in Camden county. Its object was to aid George in the dissemination of his peculiar land doctrins. The heirs of Hutchings carried this will into court, and the executor asked for a proper construction. The heirs' claim was that the bequest was illegal because it was not for a charitable, benevolent, or educational purpose, such as the law meditated. Vice-Chancellor Bird, in deciding the case to-day, coincided in this view. He said that George's doctrins, if followed out to their logical conclusion, would upset laws of hundreds of years' standing, and create chaos where now are happy homes. In reviewing Mr. George's literary works he classed many of the statements as hallucinations. There is nothing, he added, treasonable, rebellious, or attacking Christianity in the books, but he preaches doctrins at variance with the laws which the courts are every day called upon to uphold. The bequest to George is therefore declared void. New Jersey is a great and Christian state!

New Testament Morality, and Evolution.

We hav seen that the morality of the Pentateuch and the other Hebrew writings comprised within the pages of the Bible is of a very low order, embracing as it does such horrible and degrading teachings as the physical and intellectual enslavement of one portion of the community for the special benefit of the other, aggressiv warfare upon inoffensiv and defenseless peoples, polygamy, belief in witchcraft, and a number of other absurdities and barbarities which need only be mentioned to be condemned.

On the assumption that man is an animal who has, by a gradual and painful process, evolved out of barbarism by adjusting himself to the ever-changing conditions of life, it is not difficult to understand how in one age a set of actions would be regarded as moral which in another age would be considered highly immoral; how slavery would be a perfectly natural condition of things in a society composed almost exclusivly of savages, and how superior races could hope to survive in the struggle only by conquering and putting into subjection inferior peoples.

This mode of explanation, however, the Christian prohibits us from adopting, alleging that his Bible contains the highest conceivable morality; a morality proceeding from the highest source, the fountain of all truth in word and deed—in short, that the Bible contains the "beginning and end of all wisdom," and any attempt to improve upon it must end in disastrous failure. Now, if we turn from the Old to the New Testament we shall find a distinct improvement in the character of the teaching, for, amid much that is incongruous, incredible, absurd, and unnatural, we shall find principles enunciated of a loftier, more humane and useful character than anything to be found in the earlier Hebrew writings.

Not that we shall find a perfect code of morals in the teachings of the carpenter of Nazareth. The Freethinker does not expect perfection in anything. Perfection to him is but a relativ term. One thing may be more perfect than another, but absolute perfection is inconceivable. The Christian, however, is bound to believe that the doctrins of Christ are in every respect faultless; that in no stage of the world's progress can they be improved upon. To this declaration the Freethinker givs an emphatic denial. What are the distinctiv moral teachings of Jesus? Without a doubt many of the most important teachings attributed to Jesus, and some of the best among them, can be traced back to a period long anterior to the alleged birth of Christ.

The Golden Rule, "Do unto others as you would they should do unto you," was taught by Confucius hundreds of years before Jesus commenced his mission among the Jews—assuming for the nonce that the Jesus of the gospels is a historical personage about whose existence there can be no manner of doubt. Many doctrins attributed to Jesus are also attributed to Zoroaster and Buddha, both of whom lived before him. Now, the distinctiv teachings of Jesus are not by any means new, but those of them which are most original appear also to be most harmful in their tendency. Some portion of the Sermon on the Mount may be regarded as very good sentiment, but as moral teaching is quite impracticable in an age of civilization and progress.

Now, the true value of a moral precept is to be seen in this: that it is susceptible of being put into practice in every-day life without injury, but with positiv benefit, to the community. Most of the doctrins of Jesus lack this essential quality. They may hav been very good in such an age as that in which he is alleged to hav lived, but they are quite unsuited to the present condition of society in all the civilized countries of the world.

Passiv submission to insult and ill treatment can not be regarded as good morality. To submit to insult or ill treatment when they can be resisted and prevented, is the sign of weakness or folly. Such conduct givs the ruffian the power to ride rough-shod over his weaker brethren whenever opportunity allows. Yet Jesus said: "Ye hav heard that it hath been said: An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek turn to him the other and let him smite that also. And if any man sue thee at law, and take away thy coat, let him hav thy cloak also. And whoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain" (Matt. v, 38–41). If our ancestors had always adopted this course, we should be slaves to-day. But Jesus gave utterance to a number of very unreasonable doctrins. For example, "Blessed be ye poor; for yours is the kingdom of God" (Luke vi, 20) When was it blessed to be poor? Not during the nineteenth century, certainly. It is extremely doubtful if poverty is ever a blessing; and "poverty of spirit," which Jesus also advised, is a decided curse.

"Blessed are they that hunger now, for they shall be filled" (Luke vi, 26). When? In the next world, when they will hav no stomachs to fill. That's a little too late; those who starve in this world are not likely to get a front seat in the next.

"But woe unto you that are rich, for ye hav received your consolation. Woe unto you that are full, for ye shall hunger. Woe unto you that laugh now, for ye shall mourn and weep. Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you, for so did their fathers to the false prophets. But I say unto you which hear, Love your enemies, do good to them which hate you. Bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you. And unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek, offer also the other; and him that taketh away thy cloak, forbid him not to take thy coat also. Giv to every man that asketh of thee, and of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again" (Luke vi, 24–30). What would be the effect of this morality if put into practice in every-day life? Would it not destroy the foundation upon which all society rests?

If the honest man when robbed and smitten by the thief should turn the other cheek, or offer his cloak when his coat had been taken, he would be positivly promoting rascality.

Or how is it possible to love our enemies? It is difficult at times to love one's friends, but our enemies—how can we love them while we know them to be our enemies? Jesus either did not understand human nature with a "wise and learned spirit" or he has been misrepresented or misunderstood by his biographers and followers.

Equally mischievous is the following teaching: "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink; nor for your body what ye shall put on. Behold the fowls of the air," etc. (Matt. vi, 25).

The poor man who takes no thought for the morrow in modern times soon finds himself an inmate either of the workhouse or of the jail. Indeed, the civilized man is distinguished from the uncivilized in this—that while the latter is content when he has obtained enough food to satisfy his immediate wants, the former looks ahead and makes provision for months or even years.

"Lay not up for yourselvs treasures upon earth where moth and rust doth corrupt and where thieves break through and steal" (Matt. vi, 19).

With banks, insurance companies, and provident societies by the score in our midst, how is it possible for Christians to say they practice the above teaching? Moreover, wealthy Christians should always remember that "it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God" (Matt. xix, 24).

Many of them by their conduct seem to say that they will chance it; or at worst, that "a bird in the hand is worth two in a bush."

Jesus also taught self mutilation. "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out; it is better for thee to enter into life with one eye, than having two eyes, to be cast into hell." And the same with regard to hands and feet (Matt. xviii, 8, 9).

This doctrin is practiced at times by madmen or religious enthusiasts even to-day, but it was very frequently practiced in the Dark Ages.

But Jesus outraged all the tender feelings of humanity when he declared that "everyone that hath forsaken houses, or brethren or sisters, or father or mother, or children, or lands for my sake shall receive an hundredfold and shall inherit everlasting life" (Matt. xix, 29).

When to these we add the doctrin of, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi, 16), we hav put into a small compass the distinctiv moral teachings of Jesus. No teaching that I hav any knowledge of has been so productiv of evil as this last. By making belief a virtue and unbelief a vice, it has been the mainspring of persecution for hundreds of years. It has strangled science and throttled progress. Christians to-day pretend to believe in this doctrin, and persecute wherever they hav the power.

The general doctrins of Christianity hav undergone many changes, and in some cases, and among some sects, little except the name survives.

Christianity, like all other religions, has been powerless to resist the ceaseless tendency in nature and in man to change. In practice Christianity to-day is the very antithesis of what it was in the time of Jesus. Christians strive hard to get rich, despite the denunciation of their master; they appeal to the police for assistance when they are smitten, and often before they get the blow; they never part with their cloak when their coat is taken; they hate their enemies as vigorously as any pagan, and they lay up their treasures on earth—and often cheat other people out of theirs—as though they did not believe in another world from which all thieves—except David—will be unceremoniously excluded.

How is this? It is because human thought has grown; because science has increased; because men think more and believe less; because men hav found that the moral doctrins of Jesus mean moral suicide; because the affairs of this world engage their attention, instead of the affairs of the next—in a word, because in the evolution of things so-called Christians hav changed into rational creatures, while still retaining the old name. The evolutionary process affects all things. It is a law of our being that we must grow, must evolve, or decay.

The doctrins of Jesus to-day are regarded as impracticable, for we hav outgrown them; and their existence as religious literature only serves to mark the progress we hav made. ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Nebular Hypothesis.—Development of the Earth.

The conclusions of science respecting the earth and the entire universe are that the matter of which it is composed is eternal; that its time scale corresponds to its space scale; that the earth previously existed in a gaseous condition, and through countless years of time it has passed from stage to stage of development, uninhabited and uninhabitable by any living creature; that in due lapse of time, as physical conditions became favorable, organic series hav arisen; that, as the physical conditions changed, animated forms underwent modification; that out of old and disappearing species new species emerged; that within a period very recent geologically, but very remote historically, man has made his appearance.

The telescopic observations of the first Herschel satisfied him that there are many double stars—not double merely because they appear in the same line of view, but because they are connected physically and revolve around each other—and the revolution of some of these double stars has been computed. The orbital motion of these double suns in ellipses compels us to admit that the law of gravitation holds good throughout the entire universe. As far as the telescope can reach there hav been observed the operations of an immutable law, and by analogy we know that what is beyond our vision must exist by virtue of the same principle.

The following peculiarities demonstrate that the entire solar system is physically connected: All the planets and satellites move in ellipses of such small eccentricity that they are nearly circles. All the planets move in the same direction and nearly in the same plane. The satellites move in the same direction as the planets. The movement of rotation of the sun, planets, and satellites is in the same direction as their orbital motions, and nearly in the same plane. It is evident that so many coincidences could not hav been established had there been no connecting tie among these rotating bodies; that they are only parts of what must hav been a single mass.

If we admit that the substances of which the solar system consists once existed in a nebulous condition and were in rotation—and the very idea of existence implies motion—all the above peculiarities follow as a matter of necessity. Upon this hypothesis the formation of planets, satellites, asteroids—in fact, the entire solar system—is accounted for. We see the reason why the outer planets are larger and the inner ones smaller; why the outer planets hav several satellites and the inner ones few or none; and we conceive the mode of formation of Saturn's rings. But, first, we must hav some substantial evidence of the existence of such a nebulous mass before the admission can be made.

The nebular hypothesis rests principally on the telescopic discoveries made by the first Herschel, that there are scattered in the heavens many pale, gleaming patches of light, some of which are large enough to be visible to the naked eye. Some of these hav been resolved into congeries of stars, but some, as the great nebula of Orion, hav resisted all attempts with the best instruments yet made.

Those who were disposed to reject the nebular hypothesis asserted that the non-resolution was evidently due to imperfections in the telescopes used. In these instruments two functions are indispensably necessary—their light-gathering power and their defining power. Their light-gathering power depends upon the size of their object lens; their defining power, upon the correctness of their structure. Some telescopes, by reason of their great size, may possess the former quality in perfection but the latter very imperfectly, through distortions arising from flextures by reason of their weight, or through want of original configuration. Therefore, a telescope may be adequate in light-gathering power, yet by being imperfect in definition it may fail to decompose a nebula into discrete points.

Fortunately, however, in 1846 Prof. John W. Draper discovered other means for the settlement of this question. He discovered that the spectrum of an ignited solid is continuous, i. e., has neither dark nor bright lines. Fraunhofer had previously made known that the spectrum of ignited gases is discontinuous. Here, then, was a means furnished for determining whether the light emitted by a given nebula comes from an incandescent gas or a congeries of stars. If the spectrum be continuous, it is a congeries of stars; if discontinuous, a true nebula or gas.

Mr. Huggens, in 1864, applied this test in the case of the nebula in the constellation Draco; it proved to be gaseous. Later examinations hav proved that of sixty nebulæ, nineteen gave discontinuous or gaseous spectra, the remainder continuous ones. It may, therefore, be admitted that physical evidence has been obtained proving the existence of vast masses of matter in a gaseous condition, and in a temperature of incandescence. In such a nebulous mass, cooling by radiation is the necessary incident, and condensation and revolution the inevitable result. There must be a separation of rings all lying in one plane; a generation of planets all rotating alike; a central sun and attendant globes. From such chaos, through the operation of physical laws, an organized system has been produced. A separation of matter into planets and satellites has taken place through a decline in temperature.

If such is the genesis of the planetary worlds, we are forced to extend our view of the dominion of law and recognize its operation in the creation as well as the conservation of the innumerable orbs that throng the universe. We hav daily witnessed the formation of a cloud in the sky. At first but a hazy speck, a mere point barely perceptible, it increases in volume and becomes darker and denser. It assumes fantastic shapes and queer forms; it is borne away by the wind, and as it gradually came it as gradually disappears—melts away to be succeeded by others. The vesicles of which these clouds are composed arose from condensation of vapor preëxisting in the atmosphere. Through a reduction in the temperature we can assign optical reasons for the brightness or darkness of the cloud; explain on mechanical principles its drifting before the wind, and its disappearance on the principles of evaporation. A mist gathers from the sea and is borne onward by the wind until it becomes sufficiently condensed, when it returns again in raindrops, to find its way back to the ocean of which it is a part, to again, countless myriads of times, perform the same operation. In nature there is a continual metamorphosis, an affiliated sequence of events in which the parts stand in connected relation. All these facts we explain upon physical principles. All these phenomena are due to the inherent forces of the substances—properties of matter which perform their operations according to a mathematical necessity—and are not due to an arbitrary fiat.

The universe is but a cloud—a cloud of suns and worlds, formed on a space scale more extensiv, on a time scale less transient, yet, in the presence of eternity, a system of worlds is as fleeting as a mist. If there is a multiplicity of worlds in infinit space, there is also a succession of worlds in infinit time. As cloud replaces cloud in the heavens, so this starry system is the successor of countless others that hav preceded it, and is the predecessor of others that will follow. For a time must come when, through the influence of gravitation of the planets upon each other, perturbations must arise in the orbital and rotary motion of the planets, irregularity and retardation of motion must ensue; then the lesser bodies will be drawn to the greater central body, and through the concussion and pressure they must all be volatilized, and the operation of world formation through a decline of heat will be performed again.

If on physical principles we explain all the minor operations of nature, is it not reasonable that we appeal to the same agency in the origin of worlds? As to those who are disposed to set behind all this a designer and fashioner, would they please point us to where the supernatural ends and the physical begins? We no longer call into operation the power of the almighty in the fashioning of clouds in the sky, but ascribe all its operation to physical law. Why ascribe the one to the operation of law and the other to the arbitrary volition of omnipotence?

Having examined the evidence proving the gaseous condition of much of the matter throughout space, let us descend to our own sphere and examin the facts which further confirm our belief that this and, by analogous reasoning, all other worlds were formed, and are constantly being formed, from nebulous masses.

The interior of the earth is supposed to be in a molten state—a sea of liquid fire. The earth in this condition may be represented by an egg, the inner parts representing the molten mass of the interior of the earth; the shell, the earth's crust, which has been formed through the process of cooling and condensation.

The decline in the temperature of our globe must hav been attended by very many changes of a physical character; her dimensions must hav lessened; her day must hav shortened; her surface must hav frequently collapsed, and ruptures taken place along the line of least resistance. A cloud-like mist of vapor must hav encircled her; as the cooling went on, condensation took place and extensiv seas were formed, which, as further cooling took place, must hav increased in density and decreased in volume. The barometric pressure must hav declined; the constitution of the atmosphere must hav varied, especially in the amount of carbonic acid it contained.

It was shown that the daily variations of temperature—that is, those variations connected with day and night—extend but a few inches below the surface, and the seasonal ones—those variations connected with summer and winter—to only a few feet; but beyond this was discovered a stratum of invariable temperature, beneath which the heat increases one degree for every fifty or sixty feet. The regularity of this increase seemed to imply that at depths quite insignificant a very high temperature must exist. And this is sustained by such facts as that the water rushing up from a depth of nearly eighteen hundred feet has a temperature of eighty-two degrees Fahrenheit, as in the case of the artesian well of Grenelle. The mean temperature of Paris is fifty degrees Fahrenheit. These numbers giv a rate of one degree for every fifty-eight feet. If, then, the increase of heat is one hundred degrees per mile, at a depth of less than ten miles everything must be red-hot; and at a depth of thirty or forty miles the heat must be sufficient to melt all known substances. It is evident that the rise of temperature with the increasing depth is not at all local, from facts furnished by volcanoes, which can no longer be regarded as depending on restricted areas for their supply of melted matter, since they are found all over the earth's surface—on land and under the sea, beneath the equator and in the polar regions, in the interior of continents and near the shore. There are probably more than two thousand ærial and subaqueous eruptions every century. Some volcanoes, as Etna, hav for hundreds of years poured forth streams of molten matter, and still their supply seems inexhaustible. The eruption of Hecla in 1783 must hav had its origin in no superficial strata. The lava issued from a lateral orifice and in forty-two days proceeded a distance of fifty miles, when it then branched into two main streams, one pressing on forty miles, and the other fifty miles farther to the sea. The breadth of this stream of lava was fifteen miles and its depth from six hundred to one thousand feet. The great earthquake of Lisbon which occurred in the eighteenth century furnished further evidence of the high rate of temperature of the interior of the earth. Its origin was certainly deep-seated and covered an extensiv area, as it lifted the whole bed of the north Atlantic ocean; the eruption was felt from Morocco to the extreme north of Europe, and from Egypt to the great lakes of America.

Not only are proofs thus offered of the existence of a high temperature, and consequently of the lapse of enormous periods of time, by the present condition of the globe, but every trace of its former state yields similar conditions, whether considered in the organic or inorganic, in the astronomical or geological world. How could we otherwise interpret the universal occurrence of igneous rocks, some heaved up in enormous mountain ranges, some ejected from beneath, forcing their winding way through the superimposed strata; veins of different mineral constituents, having, as their relations with one another show, their origin in different ages; or those extinct volcanoes which hav lain silent for thousands of years, but which, from the presence of lava beds in their regions, bear evidence of their former activ state, or the many dislocations, subsidences, and elevations of the crust of the earth which every country presents? What other reason could be assigned for all these but a diminution of heat, contraction in diameter, and as a consequence, fractures where the consolidated parts offered the least resistance—all this requiring many ages of time? From the time our globe separated from its present mass and commenced its giddy whirl around the sun proofs are given of the deliberate and gradual process in which Nature has followed her plan of development. There has been a regular succession of events in which the past insensibly blends into the present, and in which the present as gradually blends into the future. Through the ages of eternity nature presents a continual cycle of events.

Celestial bodies are considered as having passed through a course similar to the earth's. In the case of our satellite, at least, which is no matter of speculation, but one of actual observation, its broken surface, its volcanic craters, its high mountains with their lava-clad surfaces glistening in the sunlight, demonstrate a succession of events like those of the earth, and prove a planetary as well as a terrestial geology, and that our moon was formerly in a high state of temperature, which gradually declined, requiring long periods of time.

Let it not be supposed that I am insensible of the many serious objections that are urged against the nebular hypothesis. I will not enter into any discussion of them, but will briefly summarize a few of the most important objections.

We know that, as heat may be produced by friction and pressure, the rise of temperature as we descend beneath the earth's surface is due to friction and pressure sufficient to melt vast masses of matter, furnishing volcanoes their lava, and not to a molten condition of the interior of the earth.

That there are indications that the spheroidal figure of the earth has been produced by the yielding of a solid, instead of a liquid.

That if, as explained by the nebular hypothesis, the earth was once a molten mass, the deposit of metals should be found in strata with the heavier ones below and the lighter ones above, or they should be found in strata according to their specific gravities.

That if the weight of the earth as given by astronomers is little more than six sextillions of tons, then the specific gravity of the earth is 5 1-2, when, if the interior of the earth is in a molten state, the specific gravity of the earth should not be one-half that.

That the earth is constantly growing from meteoric accretion, and in this way grew from collections of star-dust and meteors, instead of from a condensation of nebulæ.

To deny that the earth has been, and is, constantly receiving additions to its mass by meteoric accretion, would be denying the facts of daily observations; still, this would not disprove the existence of vast masses of nebulous matter, or that the earth previously existed in a molten state.

That the present interior heat of the earth may be caused by the enormous pressure to which it must be subjected is also evident, and a solid the size of the earth, in rapid rotation, might yield sufficiently to centrifugal force to produce a bulging at its equatorial diameter and a compression at the poles. The necessity of finding the metals in strata according to their specific gravities is certainly a serious objection, but we cannot expect this to occur so uniformly as that, as the earth's being in such rapid motion would tend to seriously disturb such regular conformity to the principle. For we know that heavier gases will be diffused among lighter ones when in a state of motion, but when confined, or in a state of rest, the heavier gases will settle in layers according to their specific gravities, as carbonic acid in the atmosphere, when confined, as in deep wells, or where there is no current, will settle to the bottom.

The most serious difficulty to overcome, and an objection that would stagger our belief, if not disestablish it altogether, if it were not for spectroscopic analysis, is that of a too great specific gravity of the earth. But these objections do not militate against the theory of a previously attenuated condition of the matter of which the solar system is composed, but the star-dust and meteoric accretion theory goes to confirm it. My own opinion is that the truth will be found in neither one of the theories exclusivly, but in both.

But the discoveries of Fraunhofer and Draper of the spectra of solids and gases giv the preponderance of evidence in support of the nebular hypothesis. By spectrum analysis we learn much of the constitution of the sun and stars, and also of their condition. If we know that iron givs a spectrum of some seventy lines, differing in intensity and relativ length; if we know these lines are bright when iron vapor is burning, and dark when white light is passed through such burning vapor; if we know the substances and conditions of the metal which produces such a spectrum, then, when we find in the solar spectrum a perfect coincidence of seventy dark lines, "line for line and strength for strength," we must conclude that iron is contained in the sun's atmosphere. Many of the metals that are found in the earth are known to exist in the sun or its atmosphere: Sodium, calcium, barium, magnesium, iron, chromium, nickel, zinc, strontium, cadmium, cobalt, hydrogen. Many of the stars are found to contain many of the elements found in the earth. Then the conclusion is irresistible that all the bodies of the solar system once existed in one common mass. But, as remarked on a previous page, many of the spectra prove the nebula to consist of a glowing mass of gases, instead of an intensely heated solid shining through a luminous atmosphere.

How grand, how majestic, is this orderly march of affairs in the genesis of suns and worlds, when compared with the crudities and puerilities of the Mosaic record! How beautiful and simple is the theory advanced by science—so simple a child can comprehend it—and how unlike that cosmogony which even the subtilties of scholastic theology cannot make clear!

Ministerial "Cheek."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In the Pittsburgh Dispatch of May 15, 1888, I found the following:

A paper was read in the Methodist Protestant Association yesterday morning by the Rev. William Phipps on the subject, "The Ethical Side of a Protectiv Tariff." The gentleman is a brother of Henry Phipps of Carnegie, Phipps & Co., and argued strongly that a protectiv tariff was a Christian necessity and a duty owed to the laboring men by this country. He stated that the advancement of all our interests was due mainly to the tariff. When he finished his paper a lively debate was engaged in by the members of the Association. Tariff came out on top.

To an observing mind the sublime audacity of these "Christian" ministers is the greatest marvel of the century. Their noses, whether pug or Roman, must be inserted in everything; and their efforts are sometimes most laughable. Just think of it! The Rev. William Phipps tells us a "protectiv tariff is a Christian necessity." Why a "Christian" necessity? Why should Christianity poke its nose into the affairs of state, and seek to curry favor with those who deal in matters belonging exclusivly to this world? There can be only one reason. In spiritual things, in heavenly government, they are complete failures; and must therefore endeavor to lug into their diatribes any far-fetched views that may interest the mass of humanity, and for this reason we are favored with a "man of God" standing in a pulpit preaching and pounding, not Christ crucified, not the resurrection and the life, not the felicities of the New Jerusalem, but the "ethical side of a protectiv tariff." The Nine Demands of Liberalism.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in state legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3 We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4 We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5 We demand that the appointment, by the president of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9 We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Important.

As it is necessary for the secretary to possess the most accurate data relativ to all Liberal Leagues, or auxiliary Secular Unions, which hav been granted charters within the past three years, whether those organizations are now in working order or hav, through any cause, been disbanded or discontinued, I therefore urge upon the president or secretary, or, in the absence of these officers, any members of such society, to forward me at their very earliest convenience the fullest possible answers, consistent with brevity, to the following questions:

1. When was your society organized, and how many members hav you?
2. How often do you meet, if at all?
3. What is, or was, the character of your program at regular meetings?
4. Who are, or were, your last officers?
5 If discontinued, what was the principal cause of disintegration—financial embarrassment, indifference, lack of speakers, or orthodox persecution?
6. Hav any steps been taken to revive your organization?
7. Will you call a meeting for that purpose?
8. Would you like to be represented directly (or by proxy) at the next annual Congress?
9. How many of your members subscribe for Liberal papers?
10. Will you send me the names and present address of members and all others in your vicinity likely to assist?

A word to Freethought friends who reside where no organization has ever been effected:

1. Do you indorse the above Nine Demands?
2. Do you believe in maintaining the most priceless heritage of American liberty, religious freedom, as expressed in these Demands?
3. Is not organization essential to the advancement of any cause?
4. Can you be doing your full duty without endeavoring to perfect such an organization?
5. Hav any Freethought lectures been given in your vicinity, and by whom?
6. Did they bring the purpose and work of the American Secular Union to your notice?
7. If there is no possibility of an organization, will you not help the national society this year financially?
8 If you need leaflets to urge organization, send stamps to me, and I will forward them.

I hav received the following suggestiv letter from Judge North, of California, an old and valiant Abolition worker, to which I desire to call the attention of the Liberals of the country. There is no denying the fact that the Secular Union needs more support numerically and financially than it gets:

OLEANDER, CAL., April 16, 1888.

E. A. STEVENS, ESQ., Secretary American Secular Union, Dear Sir: Being myself an old man without either health or money with which to help on the great cause of mental liberty and enlightenment, yet feeling a deep interest in its success, I venture to send you a private letter with a few suggestions. Having had some years' experience in the antislavery field, I naturally think of the methods that were then employed as applicable to our present wants. I hav observed with lively interest your practical methods and the efficiency you display in all that you hav to do. I hav thought that if you could impart your efficiency to all the agencies in the field, it would multiply the results now realized. Now, how can this be done? Following the example of the old antislavery guard, it seems to me it can be done in this way:

First, those who hav wealth, and hav the cause at heart, should confer together and plan Liberal work. They should lay out work that would cost at least $100,000 for the first year.

You may say this is very easy to plan, especially for a man who has no money of his own to giv. But how is it to be accomplished? Let us see. There were men in the antislavery ranks—several of them—that used to subscribe $10,000 each to carry forward that great reform, and this cause is even greater than that, and money is far more abundant now than it was forty years ago. There are plenty of millionaires among Freethinkers, and many of them will study long and hard, when they come to make their wills, to find out what to do with their money. They need to be educated to do good with their money while they liv; and a few of them can be, with proper effort. If even two or three of that class can be got together in each of our large cities, and made to see the danger our country is in from the growing power of bigotry, they would take hold as they did in war times. But the thing must be brought home to them, and urged upon them. If this thing were done with one-quarter of the earnestness and skill that the priests show in their efforts to get money, the work would be done speedily.

And then there is a great army of strong, clear-headed business men of wealth, who are always ten times as liberal, and ten times as useful, as the millionaires; these will be the chief reliance. Having seen what some rich men hav done in the past, I hav great confidence that more will be done by them in the future. The old antislavery champions of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia hav left successors that will follow their example. And as the West outstrips the East, what may we not expect when the West really takes hold in earnest?

Though Mr. Putnam is president of the Secular Union, you are really the general of the army, and a bugle-call from you to our wealthy men that shall put the figures high would not be without results. If Colonel Ingersoll and Courtlandt Palmer would take hold of the matter as Gerrit Smith and the Tappans used to, they would find access to the pockets of men that would raise $100.000 in a week.

But that is only one of the methods that used to be employed. An efficient force of lecturers, with fixed salaries, were sent into the field; and, in addition to the work of lecturing, each lecturer was expected to raise a good sum of money for the cause, besides his own salary. We hav able lecturers now in the field, who are doing good work, but they would not dare to appeal to the people for a large subscription, unless the appeal first came from headquarters. The Secular Union should aim at work that should command the admiration and the liberal support of the millions who agree with it in sentiment. An army of agents should fill the field, each one of whom should, in addition to his own support, bring in financial aid to the Union. In addition to that, they should be more persistent in trying to get every Freethinker to take a Freethought paper. There is nothing that can keep up a living interest in the cause like the fresh lessons of the papers. The value of Freethought literature cannot be overestimated, and it is gratifying to see how eagerly the people seize on it. If there were three times as many lecturers in the field as there are now, there is abundant work for them all. And if they were all agents of the Union, and everyone expected to raise $1,000 more than his salary, we should see a much greater success.

And, while I am making suggestions, permit me to suggest that some of our lecturers need to study skill in presenting truth with a winning aspect. Many of our best Freethinkers do not like to hear a lecturer boast of his "Infidelity." They see no reason for applying the term to themselvs. I am not at all frightened if others call me an "Infidel" or an "Atheist," but I do not call myself such names, and I hav occasion to know that persons who are not yet entirely free are repelled by the unnecessary adoption of that term. Colonel Ingersoll shows rare skill in this particular. I wish all were as skilful.

Another suggestion occurs to me. When the churches were almost a unit on the side of slavery there were a few noble exceptions, and these directed their efforts toward the church itself. This did great good. Lecturers who went to the churches with a letter of commendation from well-known ministers could lecture in the churches and to the congregations where other lecturers could not get a hearing.

Now, there are many in the churches who think as we do about the need of a more complete separation of church and state. They feel as we do about the danger our country is in from the Catholics, and also from the National Reform Association.

If a church movement could be inaugurated against these insidious attacks, and in favor of a completely secular government, it would help us very much.

I am not acquainted with Dr. Thomas or Professor Swing, but from what I hav heard of them it seems to me they should both be in favor of our Nine Demands. Then, there are liberal ministers in Wisconsin and Minnesota. And all the Unitarian ministers should be with us on those points. Now, though they would not agree with all our notions, they could do us great good by lecturing and preaching their own advanced views. If some of them could be induced to take a trip to this coast and lecture on the danger to the country from any union of church and state, and also on the danger from the pope's influence in directing our politics, they would get a wide hearing, and prepare the way grandly for the Secular Union. And by charging an admission fee it would more than pay expenses. It seems to me that some such measure, if skilfully carried out, would be as good as the breaking-plow on the prairies, preparing the soil for better culture.

I must not forget to congratulate you on your great achievement in Chicago in converting a church to a forum. I hope your example may inspire many others to do likewise. Yours for Freethought, J. W. NORTH.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

NATIONAL CITY, CAL., April 9th–12th.—This is one of the most prosperous cities in southern California. Nature has done much for it, and its founders and promoters hav shown an enterprise never excelled on this coast or any other part of the world. National City and the whole San Diego bay region owes its prosperity to the two brothers Frank and Warren Kimball, who came here twenty-two years ago from Concord, N. H., and for $20,000 bought 2,600 acres. They are Liberals, practical business men, who built up the town by fostering manufactures, were always ready to put their money into any enterprise that insured employment to mechanics, and they sacrificed 1,700 acres of their land to secure the Southern California railroad to connect with the city.

National City is but little over two years old and has grown to four thousand population and has a railroad, street-cars, gas, electric light, and the grandest system of water-works in all California. The young city has been singularly fortunate in drawing to itself a most intelligent, energetic, and public spirited class of people. It is worth a trip to the coast to meet such a glorious family of noble Freethinkers as that of Squire Burgess. The second son, Alph. N. Burgess, is a perfect representativ of the genuin Liberal gentleman, full of push and energy, ever ready for any work that will promote human happiness. He possesses the happiest disposition; meets all reverses or disappointments with an honest, hearty laugh that bids defiance to fate, and with buoyant spirit, born of indomitable will, does all possible to repair evils, or renew the conflict till right prevails. In the five happy days I spent in his company, I never saw a shade of sadness on his face or heard a tremor in his voice but once, when he was telling of sickness and sorrow beyond his power to alleviate. Of course, he is a great admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I delivered three lectures at National City under the disadvantage of having a poor hall, yet had good interest and was made glad by the declaration of several that they had been deeply interested and helped by the lectures. One young man, an ordained minister, thanked me for making plain the truth, and said that henceforth he should be an earnest worker for Liberalism. I endeavored to explain the necessity and best plan of practical organization. An earnest effort is making to accomplish it, and success is assured.

LOS ANGELES, April 14th, 15th, 16th.—This is the rendezvous of sharpers and schemers. Even the Liberals, with some few exceptions, seem to hav lost all sense of common honesty, and evince no respect for their word, or agreements made, only as their interest prompts. Los Angeles is a good place for real estate sharks to congregate, and for all decent people to avoid. I did not lecture at Los Angeles; no arrangements were made for me to do so.

SANTA ANA, CAL., April 17th, 18th, 19th.—There is an adipose excrescence, named Chestnut, who claims to be president of the Santa Ana Liberal League, who toadies to the church and talks loud Liberalism when his wife nor any Christians are within hearing. Poor wives! Even if they are fanatics and church devotees, they must love something, hav something to be interested in. When they find the creature they call husband so destitute of all manhood, they are to be pitied, not blamed, for seeking relief in the church.

D. Edson Smith, a Spiritualist, but one of the generous, good, whole-souled, honest-hearted brand, ever ready to do all in his power to advance the cause of Liberalism, a bright, brainy, hard-working, noble man; Noah Smithwick, an octogenarian blacksmith, who despite age is full of vim and zeal for Freethought, and friend Newman, the Infidel harness-maker, a true Liberal of most quiet mien but unfaltering courage and a kindly, generous heart, compose the truth seeker trinity of Santa Ana. Of the lectures the leading paper of the county, the Santa Ana Standard, of April 21st, says:

C. B. Reynolds, the great American Freethinker from New York, lectured three nights this week in Neil's hall. Unfortunately his coming was not known, and the public had no knowledge of it and the attendance was light. As a lecturer he ranks high, being a splendid orator and reasoner. His lectures were surpassingly interesting and impressiv, and his enlightened, magnanimous views upon the rights and duties of mankind were an honor to all the creeds and religious ever taught by a hired priesthood. He is a profound scholar, and has been a prominent minister in the church for many years, but believes that humanity to man is the best religion of the world. We hope he may come again.

Some people imagin a Liberal lecturer has nothing but beds of roses and coins money. The three lectures at Santa Ana realized for me seventy cents; railroad fare to and from, $7; balance of cash out of pocket, $6 30. That is nothing. I do not murmur or complain, only I wished to correct the impression that I was amassing a colossal fortune or about to rival the Goulds and Rothschilds.

ORANGE, CAL., April 20th, 21st, 22d.—I came t

this place on the invitation of that whole-souled, honest-hearted Liberal, Charles Baker. There is as great diversity of persons as of places. When thousands of miles from home, dependent on making lecture engagements on the route, and with no way of knowing the people who write you only that they claim to be Liberals, it is not cheering to find no arrangements made after having regular engagements and refusing other offers. I keep an appointment at heavy expense of fare and extra baggage and on arrival at the place find no arrangements made. The parties coolly tell me, or send postal card: "Owing to circumstances cannot arrange as I hoped." I am short of adjectivs to do justice to such excrescences on the Liberal ranks, but, alas! they are not as scarce as, for the cause of humanity, I could wish. Such creatures are to me a mystery profound. How did they ever attain to such a depth of contemptible meanness? Surely, before reaching such a despicableness they must hav had some sleepless nights. How did they refrain from getting up in the night and kicking themselvs to death? Such wretches would make one despair of humanity only that there are so many noble hearts like friend Charles Baker and Jos. Roberts, of Orange. To make the acquaintance and friendship of one such compensates for the meanness of a swarm of pretended Liberals who are really Clark Braden skunks. Mr. Baker could attend only one lecture, and to do so had to drive eighteen miles after the lecture was over, but could take special pains to insure the fulfilment of the agreement. Friend Roberts was revived by the lectures, and from being quiet, inactiv, will henceforth be aggressiv. Very much of interest was awakened; the cause received mighty impetus, and the lectures gave vertebræ to many weak ones; all Liberals felt greatly encouraged, for it was demonstrated there were ten times as many persons of intelligence and influence who were Liberals as anyone supposed.

I had a most pleasant visit at the ranch of Mr. J. Parker. He has the most extensiv and luxuriant fruit farm in this section, and is a sterling Liberal. While there I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. and Mrs. K. Parker, of Anaheim. Mrs. Parker is a woman of very great ability; a practical, earnest worker; enthusiastic, but not content to begin and end in effervescence. She bemoans the lack of by-laws, leaflets of instruction how to carry on a local Union, etc. Like the friends at San Jacinto, they are sadly disappointed, for their expectations were raised as to receiving great help in organization, and none of their expectations hav been realized.

There is very deep interest in Liberalism in Orange and vicinity, and if Col. R. G. Ingersoll could be induced to giv just one lecture at Orange, no pavilion ever erected would hold the people, and it would do immense good; no long rain after a long drouth would be more gratefully appreciated. To secure such a pavilion and do all else necessary would to Mr. Joseph Roberts, Charles Baker, and the great family of Parkers be but a glad labor of love. Would it could be!

San Pasqual, Cal., April 24th, 25th, 26th.—This is a charming valley eight miles from the railroad, and here in a magnificent ranch shut in by mountains I found B. B. Brockwood, one of those grand, earnest, genuin Liberals whom it will be joy, pride, and honor all the rest of my life to call friend. For years he had to liv his principles alone, none even of his own family being in sympathy with him, but by the exercise of a loving, benevolent spirit he has won the respect and kind regard of all. Surrounded by Seventh Day Adventists, any attempt to popularize Liberalism or induce his neighbors to listen to an exponent of our principles, to anyone else would hav seemed utterly hopeless. But, strong in the right, having effected much by the distribution of Liberal literature, he next, expecting to hav to meet the entire expense himself, invited me; and I am happy to know our success was far beyond his most sanguin expectations. Many of the Adventists did attend, and their leader, a very intelligent, fair-minded man, was so favorably impressed that he voluntarily contributed toward the expenses and expressed himself convinced of the correctness of our positions and principles, and said publicly that if there can only be an organization here with a science school on Sunday, and efforts to promote sociability, he will be among the first to join. Quite a number came to the same determination. A committee was appointed to arrange a meeting to organize the San Pasqual Liberal Union.

I had discussion sprung on me at Phenix, Ariz. All arrangements were made, and I was to start for Phenix from San Pasqual. Their own proposition was that their champion should be a courteous gentleman, a minister in good standing in his own denomination. At the last moment my friends discovered this man was the infamous Clark Braden. Of course I would not meet the dirty vilifier, but wrote friends I would meet any other man the church folks would select, with the one provision that their man should be in good standing in his own denomination.

Jephthah.

Jephthah—a good name for our Anglomaniacs to practice dropping h's with—was a party you know very little about, I venture to say, yet was he one of the manifold "deliverers of Israel." Jeph—for short—was the son of Gilead, if that will help you any, but not by Gilead's wife—strange as it may seem, the old man is credited in the Holy Queer with only one wife—his mother being, according to the H. Q., which doesn't mince matters at all, a harlot.

But that wasn't Jeph's fault, he having had no voice in the matter at all, but the fault of his sire, who ought to hav been ashamed of himself, particularly as he was raising sons in a legitimate manner at home. However, this affaire d'amour, this "accident of love," as Sarah Bernhardt would say, may hav occurred before Gil's marriage, which would mend matters some, and so let us hope it did. The H. Q. had ought to hav made the dark light in this case, but it didn't, being very queer about some things, as well as very queer about some other things.

Jeph lived with the old folks—was one of the family, you know—but there came a time when the other boys concluded that he would make one too many when the old man pegged out and the divvy was to be made, and so they bounced him from the old homestead, when he lit out for the land of Tob, where he did a very good business and was content to remain. Some years after he was bounced, trouble sprung up between Israel and the Ammonites—which I wish to remark that it was an exceedingly cold epoch when Israel was not in trouble with some of her neighbors—and the elders of Gilead went out after Jeph, even unto the land of Tob went they out after Jephthah, that he might be their leader in the circus about to open.

The bait was too tempting for Jeph to resist, and he caught on, but not until he had slung at the heads of the elders solid slabs of scorn studded with sardonic stings of serrated "sarkasum;" "and it was so," that he then went with the elders to Gilead, whence he had been bounced. Well, he proved a trump card, did Jeph, and the way he wiped the floor of the earth with the Ammonites, slew their soldiery, carried cities, threw down towers and donjon-keeps, was a caution to cats, and a multitude of cats, make no mistake! Overwhelming numbers, walled cities, and strong towers were nothing to him; he got there all the same, and woe was abroad in the land all on account of Jephthah.

Jeph would hav come out of this raid, and the whole business, probably, with flying colors, had it not been for a dreadful tragedy which he brought upon his house by the shooting off of the too fresh mouth he carried about with him. "And it was so," that Jahveh was with him, you know, and, elated at the honors that loomed before him, he one day said to Jahveh, "If you carry me through this business straight, I vow a vow that whatsoever first comes out of my house to meet me, when I come marching home victorious, shall be thine for a burnt-offering!" Oh, that big mouth of his! Oh, that freshness for which there was no call! It put him in a terrible hole, and Jahveh wouldn't or couldn't, surely didn't, pull him out!

"See! the conquering hero comes," the bands played as Jephthah wheeled his chariot into the avenue where he lived, to see coming out to meet him, and the first to come from his house, his only daughter, a dear little thing of sweet sixteen, playing a tambourine as she came dancing out! The sight of her, under the circumstances, broke poor Jeph all up, as it would any white man, and he was crushed to earth, as it were! Tearing at his new uniform, he cried out in bitterness of soul, "O my daughter! thou hast knocked me out, for I opened my mouth to the Lord, and I can't go back on myself!"

And the girl, what did she say? Well, with all the coolness, as well as sweetness, that characterize ice cream, she thus or thusly unto her sire responded, "Well, pop, if thou hast opened thy mouth to the Lord, that settles it! [These words, and the tone thereof, show that she knew her sire was liable, when he opened his mouth, to put his foot in it.] Do unto me according to thy vow malgré its freshness, but giv me a two months' outing in the mountains previously before the roast," or words to that effect.

And did Jephthah grant the stay? He did. And did the girl come back on time? I grieve to say she was foolish enough to do so! And did Jephthah fulfill his vow and offer her as a burnt-offering to the Lord—did he stick and actually roast her on the altar? According to the returns in the Holy Queer, which returns you can't go back of, you know, he did, it exasperates me to say! We are spared the particulars of this revoltingly horrible scene, but that the vow was made good, the H. Q. positivly states!

Now, where was Jahveh on the occasion of this dreadful roast? Echo answers in thunder tones, Where? Why didn't he call a halt, when he found Jeph was a man of his word, and meant business, as with Abraham? We shall never know, probably, but it looks as though it was because the sacrifice was a daughter and not a son! Feminins were of small account in those days, even in man's eyes, much less in Jahveh's. But it was a horribly outrageous thing for Jahveh to let that roast go on, even if it was only a girl that was to die! If he had been a square up-and-up God at the time Jeph opened his big mouth, he would hav said to the fresh rooster, "I won't hold you to that vow, Jeph, because your daughter will be the first to come out to meet you, as I happen to know." Then, even though wishing to try Jeph, as he did Abe, he might, at the supreme moment, hav opened out his bowels of compassion and spared the innocent girl's life, and Jeph the mental agony he must hav undergone!

But Jeph himself, why didn't he open his big mouth—it was all too small at that terrible moment—and say to this effect: "O Lord, you see I am willing to make good that rash vow of mine; but can't you let up on me, as you did on Abraham?" Had Jeph done this, or even positivly refused, at the last moment, to consummate the diabolical affair, he would stand higher in the community to-day than he does. For one of said community, I myself account him a cold-blooded murderer! Of the two, Jeph and Jael, I consider the first-named the murderer most foul! Jael treacherously murdered an enemy of her people and God; Jeph openly slaughtered his daughter and only child, who worshiped after the manner of his own heart! Jael's was an act of diabolical treachery; Jeph's, diabolical devotion, and the worse of the two, as I view it.

But moreover and howsomever, after all, Jahveh was the prime factor in the deep damnation of Jeph's daughter's taking off, as I look at it. He could hav prevented this damnable butchery, and didn't! He could hav saved that young girl, who might hav become an honored "mother in Israel," but he let her go like a lamb to the slaughter! How interested he was in the eating of that pippin by Eve, and how quickly he arrived on the scene of assimilation! But here a young girl was to be stuck in the jugular, and her soft, white, quivering flesh roasted, aye, burnt to a crisp, and Jahveh, where was he? Very likely off stirring up some other tribe of Israel to slaughter. Anyhow, he was very conspicuously absent when Jephthah's daughter went up en roast in flame and smoke! Horrible!

After this private horror of his own, Jeph attended to public business as though nothing had happened, on one memorable occasion getting away with forty thousand Ephraimites at one fell swoop, as it were; shortly after which he "slept with his fathers," after the manner of most of his predecessors. He may be a high pie seraph now in the city of rolled gold set with diamonds, but when I get there I shall giv him the cold shake and show him that I prefer the company of Shamgar, if I can find the doughty ox-goadist! The moral of this story, to followers of Jahveh, is: Beware of a too fresh mouth, for should you open it when enthused too wide, and so put your foot in it, be sure that Jahveh will not pull the latter out. Selah!

Si Slokum.

P.S.—I find I was wrong with regard to the closing part of Jeph's career. He didn't "sleep with his fathers," but simply died and was buried in one of the cities of Gilead. It is well not to distort history, especially "sacred" history, you know.

Hostility to New Things.

H. G. S. Noble, in the Popular Science Monthly for June.

A universal law of social progress, with which we are all familiar, is that established systems in thought, morals, manners, government, or any department of human activity, struggle to perpetuate themselvs by a fight against all innovations. Whatever is new and progressiv, or represents the requirements of an enlarging field of life, has got to gain its foothold in the face of the powerful opposition of the old and preëstablished. Those more perfected and exact conceptions of nature which we call scientific ideas hav prevailed only after centuries of moral strife with the inherited superstitions and imperfect generalizations of our semi-civilized forefathers. The progressiv and liberal governments of our most advanced nations to-day hav been established in spite of the bitter opposition of their predecessors, and are themselvs fighting tooth and nail the higher forms that will succeed them. In literature and art old schools strive to deny existence to the new; and, even in the little affairs of our daily lives, we are all permitting the things that are, and "hav sufficed to our fathers before us," to keep out the better things that might be.

The Woman Suffrage Question Settled.

It is a pity for so much valuable time to be wasted as is wasted in discussions over the relativ brain value of men and women, for it has nothing to do with the voting privilege. The men vote, not because they hav larger brains than women, but because they are always ready to hav their brains knocked out for the common defense. They monopolize the voting because it would be mere child's-play to giv it to the class that could not hold it except by the courtesy and sufferance of men. There are a great many men who still hold to the superstition that a piece of paper can be made to perform the function of money simply by fiat. This is of the same nature as the perpetual motion superstition, that you can get more force out of a thing than there is in it. The woman suffrage superstition is a superstition of the same nature. The believers in it imagin that women by dropping pieces of paper in a ballot-box can somehow or other enforce their will, though they cannot otherwise. Men will never for any length of time allow women to decide by their votes when they shall make war. The voting class has always been and always will be the fighting class. In all the councils of our barbarous ancestors the warriors were the ones who decided the questions in the council, and they voted "Aye" by hammering on their shields with their swords—as in the Norse legend of Frithiof it is said, "Tusen svert hamrade af tusen skolder" (A thousand swords hammered on a thousand shields).

Our suffrage-seeking sisters beg the whole thing when they claim suffrage as a right. Where does one man get the right to vote his neighbor into the army or vote taxes on his property? Is that a natural right? The analytical method, the following society to its beginning and fountain-head, will show that it is simply an agreement among individual men, and that the family, not the individual, is the unit of society. If the young brave with his one vote was confronted in the council by the warrior with a wife, mother, and mother-in-law, he would decidedly object to having the votes of those three women counted in deciding whether or not he expose himself to getting his brains knocked out in war, whatever fine brain development the three squaws might hav. And the question is exactly the same in our more complicated society, though not as easy for everyone to see.

When, as a member of the first legislature of Wyoming, I consented to the experiment, it was as a doctor makes a small-pox pustule on the arm in order to keep it from invading the whole body.

I read not long ago where a meeting of women declared themselvs in favor of "Prohibition enforced by woman suffrage." Suppose the majority of men don't want Prohibition, who is going to do the "enforcing?" There is superstition worthy of Uncle Remus, that there is "conjur'" in the piece of paper. Men's ballots are potential clubs and cannon.

Furthermore, the suffrage-seekers do not represent their sex.

It would be very hard to commit a greater piece of cowardice than for men to put political burdens on women. And no greater blunder could possibly be committed, especially by Freethinkers. We can hardly find enough Freethinking women for wives; many must go into the ranks of superstition for them. What would become of liberty when the Christian clergy marshaled their women and voted them solid, as they certainly would?

Women are deprived of some of their rights, but they will some day get them all, and by the asking. Frequent asking, no doubt, but still only asking. And they cannot wrest rights from us.

Whatever there is in me of kindness, sympathy, respect, and devotion comes to the surface in presence of a present or prospectiv mother. And if the mothers did not care most for their children and little or nothing for politics there would shortly be no human society left. I, who hav no wife, hav never yet seen the husband who showed his wife what I thought due consideration. The old Norse word for a woman is quinna, or queen. They are our queens, and as such I am proud to acknowledge their sway and let the home be their kingdom and love their crown and scepter. But we men will always do the fighting and voting, for which they are unfitted, and they will perform the perilous task of bringing children into the world. For, as Professor Huxley says, if the world is to go on, some persons must be at the trouble of bringing into it annually as many as die out of it.

I think that women hav the natural right to dress as they choose, and it ought to be secured to them. They ought also to be in the pulpit as preachers and the men ought to get out of them.

Look at the skeleton of a man and of a woman. Nature has put her chief work and material on the man's brain-case and the woman's pelvic bones. The mild intellectual effort required in the pulpit would not rob woman's reproductiv district of material. And the pastoral visit, and the parishioner's visit to the dim, religiously lighted room of the pastor, would not be fraught with the same danger.

If women were given the voting privilege, it would then simply be a matter of time when a number of determined men should overthrow the existing government and found another on the basis of restricted suffrage.

"Men, Women, and Gods" in Court.

One of the most remarkable and "trying" trials in the history of modern jurisprudence occurred at the late term of this (Cass county) circuit court. It was a suit for separate maintenance, brought by a young wife against her "old Infidel husband," for a species of "infidelity" which hitherto the statute was silent upon and the courts hav not before entertained. We let the "strong point" in her bill speak for itself:

As an illustration of the defendant's arbitrary and unnatural treatment of this petitioner, your orator states that, before their said marriage, the defendant knew that your orator was a member of a Christian church, and that she desired to continue her connection in some similar church organization, wherever she might reside; and, in conversing upon the subject of religion before said marriage, the defendant professed to believe in the inspiration of the scriptures (except that he doubted the accuracy of the scriptural account of Christ's miracles), and stated to your orator that he would in no wise interfere with your petitioner's religious beliefs, or hinder her in the performance of what she conceived to be her religious duties; and your orator states that, while thus conversing upon religious topics, the bearing of the defendant was so reverential and sanctimonious that she believed him to be a conscientious and upright man; but your orator avers that, after her said marriage and during all the period of cohabitation, the defendant took every opportunity to dispute the truth of the Bible, to ridicule Christian churches and the members thereof, and altogether by his conduct and language revealed himself to this petitioner as a scoffer and mocker at all things religious. Your orator further states that said defendant commanded and compelled her to read works advocating the doctrins of Infidelity, and refused to permit her the privilege of uniting with the church at Beardstown, Ill., where she and the defendant reside.

For novelty in the legal catalog, this eclipses a New York dime museum. Suffice it to say that not a single assertion in the foregoing bill was sustained, but each was disproved.

The manner in which the undersigned was brought into the case as a witness is as follows. (The specimen of testimony we now furnish shows that the whole affair assumed a pronounced symptom of the seriocomic.) In her direct testimony the claimant stated that I had furnished her husband with Helen Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods." This was the last straw on the back of the orthodox domestic camel. That he had "commanded and compelled her to read" this and other "works advocating the doctrins of Infidelity." This, of course, invaded her Methodistic proclivities. I was then placed upon the stand to testify to the nature of "Men, Women, and Gods." And, as in past life I hav been more or less intimately associated with all three, I profess to know something about them. While passing to the stand, the sneeringly playful remark passed round, "There goes the old heretic." I replied, "Yes, I knew that my principles would ultimately lead me to the stake, and this would probably prove to be tougher than the one I had the unenviable privilege of testing at dinner in the hotel." My sworn testimony was to the effect that Miss Gardener's book is one which any intelligent woman may well be proud of reading and comprehending, and that some books written against the Bible, Miss Gardener's being one, are undoubtedly good even for women to read. The prosecution was in full sympathy with the orthodox church—one of them a pillar in the Congregational society here. This testimony fired the hearts of these modern Inquisitors. While this pillar in the church confessed, previous to going to trial, that his client had no case, yet he professionally extorted from this "old Infidel" a $75 fee before taking the wife's case into court. But he went forward to the communion table last Sunday.

Really "the nice point" in this case, and one argued with much shrewdness, however little logic, was, how far the expression of anti-Christian views in the family and in the presence of a Christian wife who married for money would go to render her life intolerable, and subject her to "abuse and cruelty." Though in this instance the claimant lost the case, yet it was decided "without prejudice." Hence, upon additional or supposed new evidence, his Christian wife who can marry for money—which an Infidel woman could not do and retain social standing—can again place "the old Infidel" on the financial and legal rack. She can thus repeatedly chain him Prometheus-like to the rock of statutory custom while lawyers religiously orthodox like so many vultures savagely tear out his vitals.

The defendant in this case is a man of unusual intelligence and a physician of over forty years' experience.

The only "Infidel" books found in his house are the Popular Science Monthly, the North American Review, and, outside the one we loaned him, we might add the Bible, as its own refutation. But woe be to the husband of an orthodox bride if she reads and accidentally understands Helen Gardener's book—or, maybe, doesn't happen to understand it! Unless she love him and the truth more than the church, he may immediately make arrangements before marriage for sustaining a suit for separate maintenance.

Helen Gardener should, on Bible ground, be heralded as a second messiah, for doing what Jesus did. "Suppose ye that I am come to giv peace on earth? I tell you nay; but rather division" (Luke xii, 51). "For I am come to set a man at variance; and a man's foes shall be they of his own household" (Matt. x, 35, 36).

ZOA TOPSIS.

Dark-Circle Materialization.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Two slate-writing séances hav been described in THE TRUTH SEEKER, the first by me, the second by my wife. The questions I addressed in writing to three departed friends were all answered on the slates. The handwriting was generally like theirs, and I know that no eye but mine saw what I wrote. I got no written answer from Thomas Paine, nor from the living spirit of Mrs. Slenker; but what Mr. Keeler wrote on the slate with his own hand about her was, as I hav said, the most interesting part of the performance.

The questions which my wife wrote to five deceased relativs were all answered, four of them on the slate and one verbally. These questions were written out before she went, and all she did in the presence of Mr. Keeler was to add the full names after the words father, mother, etc. This she did when Mr. Keeler's back was turned and he was some distance away from her. Not a word of the contents of these papers was seen by Mr. Keeler, and we now hav them all in our possession. Out of a dozen names written on the slates, most of which were spoken also by Mr. Keeler, there was not a single mistake, and the answers were all responsiv to the written questions.

And now I am going to describe a dark séance which my wife, her aunt, and myself attended. The number present was about twenty, each of whom paid at the conclusion of the séance $1. We were there early and inspected the room, especially the corner behind the curtain. The curtain was attached at one end to the jamb of the door entering the parlor, and at the other end to the sliding door, about a foot from its jamb. This formed a triangle whose sides were about six feet long, and the hypothenuse (i.e., the curtain) eight or nine feet long. The hight of the curtain was about seven feet.

The carpet was firmly tacked all around the inclosed corner. There was no possible opening through the small section of the folding door covered by the curtain. The wall paper in the corner was protected temporarily by a stiff sheet of wood paper so loosely attached that we could see, by turning it up at the bottom and ends, that behind or underneath it was all solid wall. In short, there was positivly no possible place within that inclosure for a confederate to get in.

Mr. Keeler came in shortly after 8 o'clock. One gas burner on the chandelier was lighting the room. Another one, nearest the curtain, with pink tissue paper covering the glass globe, was now lighted, and the other burner turned out. Mr. Keeler seated himself on a stool in the sharp angle next the folding door, behind the curtain. Close by him on the outside sat a gentleman who acted as director or manager. We were told to respond to any call of a name that we recognized, and to come up quickly but gently to the curtain. Two of the nearest spectators were my wife and aunt, seated about seven feet from the curtain, directly in front. I sat a little farther off. The light was turned very low, but yet we could see one another dimly, and anything white was very visible.

The first materialization was a familiar one, answering to "Wash," his whole name being George Washington Eames, a sea captain from Maine, who was said to hav lost his life by drowning. He had considerable to say, and his speech was defectiv, owing to an apparent absence of the pallet. He came out before the curtain, which was divided in the middle, and carried on a dialog with various persons present. He was without a coat. We could distinctly see his shirt-sleeves, and he moved out some distance from the curtain. He reappeared several times during the evening.

The next appearance was a girl called Maud. She also was a familiar spirit, known, when living, to some present, and always recognized by her natural voice. She moved about in the room a few moments and then disappeared.

Then came at the opening of the curtain a white figure, and the director called out, "Selina." My wife's aunt had a sister of that name who died in Paris, but it was pronounced Seleena. She inquired for the surname, but got no answer. I spoke out and said, "I had a sister Selina." Then the response was, "Selina Churchill." I went up to the curtain, but there I met, not a female form, but Captain Wash. "You are not my sister," said I; "you are not in petticoats but pants." "Yes," said he, "but I once had petticoats." "True," I replied, "but that was a long time ago." "And you, too," said he,

"once had petticoats." "Yes," I answered, "but so long ago that I don't remember wearing them." Then I took Wash by the hand; it was large and warm. I tried to see his features, but the light was too dim to make them out clearly, and while I stood looking at him he suddenly vanished. My sister did not come again.

The next spirit announced, as another white form appeared, was "Harriet." My wife asked for the full name. "Harriet Osborn," was the answer. My wife went up and said, "O mother!" and tried to take her hand. "Not yet," said the spirit in a whisper, as she drew back. "Did you think I would come to-night?" said she. "I hoped so, mother," my wife replied. Then the spirit said, "Bring Sarah." So my wife called up her Aunt Sarah, and the same question was repeated, "Did you think I would come to-night?" Again the spirit said, "Tell Mr. Burr that David is here" (my brother David died in 1861). "Mother, are you happy?" inquired my wife. "Yes," was the answer. Presently the spirit grasped with her two hands the hand of my wife and kissed her on her cheek. The face was thin and emaciated, not at all like that of Mr. Keeler. And while holding my wife's hand the spirit form dropped quickly to the floor without a sound, the last vestige of it appearing on the floor like a large pocket-handkerchief.

Mrs. Burr wishes to say that she does not claim to hav recognized, in the darkness, the face of her mother, which appeared to be imperfectly formed, but what the spirit said and did was characteristic of her when in life.

Not less than twelve spirits appeared during the evening, some of them for the first time, and all were recognized. They were old and young, large and small, stout and slender. Mr. Keeler is rather short and stout. One tall, well-dressed male spirit promenaded arm in arm with one of the women. He allowed himself to be closely seen by several of us successivly. I was the last to inspect him. His face was more clearly defined than that of Captain Wash. I could not, however, make out his features very satisfactorily, but when my aunt inspected him she saw him smile. He suddenly vanished as I was looking at his face. He had a full beard.

An old, white-haired man appeared, and was recognized by several as a former resident of Washington. He was small, crooked, and thin. He walked out into the middle of the room and then took a seat near the curtain. Then he beckoned to an old gentleman to come and sit on his knee, which he did. A lady present, who is well known to me, said that she and a gentleman, whom I also well know, once sat together each on one knee of that spirit. The old man's form slowly disappeared as if sinking through the floor, and the last we could see of him was his white head.

At one time two spirits came out at once. One, a female, stood at the end of the curtain farthest from the medium; the other, a male, came out, passed before her, and returned within the curtain.

What do I think of all this? In regard to the slate-writing, I say most positivly that deception was impossible. What, then, produced the writing on the slates? Certainly not Mr. Keeler with his material hands. Further than that what can I say? Only that I know of no solution of the mystery so rational as that our departed friends do sometimes manifest themselvs in this imperfect and unsatisfactory way.

In regard to the dark-circle phenomena, there seems to be no possible trick by which they could be performed, and if they are not a fraud I see no more rational hypothesis to account for them than that the spirits are what they profess and purport to be.

After the performance I spoke to Mr. Keeler. He did not remember me until I said, "I had some slate-writing and one of the questions I wrote was to a living person." "Oh, yes," he replied; "to Elmina;" and seemed to be trying to repeat the rest of the name. But I was satisfied with that. Now, where did he get the impression of the name "Elmina?" I certainly never gave it to him—only wrote it on a slip of paper at the slate-writing séance.

On the next Sunday evening, at the close of a lecture by John B. Wolfe at the Spiritual Hall, Mr. Keeler wrote down sixty-five names and read them off to the audience. Two-thirds of them were recognized and responded to. My wife and aunt were present; I was not. Among the names were those of my brother David and sister Selina. Only two verbal messages were given, and one of them came from my brother, in these words: "Tell him to get out of that Materialistic state; it will be better for him." There was no mistaking that message as intended for me. My brother was a Baptist Sunday-school superintendent.

But in another letter I shall describe even greater wonders, at a light-circle séance. W. H. Burr.

Washington, D. C., May 14, 1888.

The above statement of facts, so far as we were cognizant of them, is true; and we concur in Mr. Burr's judgment in regard to the most rational solution of the mysterious phenomena.

Victoria A. Burr.
Sarah Alexander.

Mrs. E. D. Slenker's Experience.

A man convinced against his will
Is of the same opinion still.

That is, he is not really convinced at all, though he may be bewildered and bothered in mind as to what is the actual truth in the case.

Now, when I asked Mr. Burr to investigate slate-writing, I felt that a man as astute and philosophical as he is would be pretty apt to see fraud and trickery if there should be any.

In the séance, he says, there is no room for fraud unless his senses deceive him. Well, our senses can very easily be made to deceive us under the skilful hands of a thaumaturgist.

Now I will merely mention a few suspicious circumstances. I was at a séance where we wrote in a small pass-book, at the medium's request, names, etc. I did not see how it was possible for the medium to know what we wrote. He desired us to write pretty heavily, so it would be plain; but we each tore out what we wrote and kept it ourselvs. But we got replies tallying with each. After all was over, I learned that there was impression paper placed between the leaves of the book, thus reproducing the writing on another leaf.

Mr. Burr tells us that after the folded slips were written the wife and child of the medium entered. It was just so when I was at Caffray's. The wife came with a message. But I am sure there was collusion and that was part of the play. I think the ballots were read by Keeler or wife. How it was done, of course I can't say. I am sorry Mr. Burr did not see the telegram.

Keeler took one of the slates and wrote on it, and pretending to read it aloud to Mr. Burr, he afterward apparently rubbed it out. How do we know he read what he wrote? Mr. Burr should hav asked to read it himself. It may be that the writing was not rubbed off and was used as the communications.

True, all this is guesswork, but it proves there was immense room for fraud.

Keeler might know Mr. Burr well, as he is a prominent man in Washington, and mediums make it a point to know all about any person who might giv them a call.

Caffray tore up my ballots; was called from the room by his wife; took the scraps of the torn ballots along; was gone long enough to piece them together and write my messages; came back, got more slates and mixed them with mine, and finally the séance closed by giving me three communications, that, I am sure, from all the circumstances, were written while he was out of the room.

I am not fighting straws, but I really am desirous of getting at the naked truth—if Comstock will allow me the expression.

I would like to liv at least a few hundred years, but our wishes will not create their fulfilment.

I do not say there are no real phenomena. It is probable where there is so much smoke there is some fire. But the cause of the fire may be very simple once we get at it.

So I ask one and all to help investigate, and do it fairly and honestly, and with open eyes, asking only for truth, pure and unadulterated.

Dr. Slade's Slate-Writing Abilities.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav just finished reading an article under the above caption in your last issue of The Truth Seeker, by W. H. Burr, in which he described an interview with a Mr. Keeler, a medium; and as his sitting with Mr. Keeler corresponds so nearly to the one I had with Dr. Slade in Buffalo last week, I thought it best to relate what passed on that occasion.

On learning from a friend that Dr. Slade was in Buffalo, I took the cars on Monday last and traveled a distance of fifty miles to hav a sitting with the above world-renowned independent slate-writer. On reaching Buffalo I stepped into a store and purchased a pair of slates, and went immediately to the doctor's boarding-place, which was at a private house in the city. The doctor when I entered was regaling himself with an after-dinner cigar, and we naturally fell into conversation upon the subject of Spiritualism. He evidently wished, so it seemed to me, to impress me with the idea that he was no fraud, which, I must allow, I readily fell in with.

We soon took seats at the table, the doctor, my friend (who, by the way, is a firm believer in Spiritual manifestations), and myself. As soon as we were seated raps, as they are called, began to be made, as it seemed, on all parts of the table, but from what cause I did not then know, and do not now.

The spirits apparently being willing, like Mr. Barkis, the doctor requested that I should ask a question to some departed friend of mine, which I did on one of the slates, holding it so he could not see the writing made by me. He took the slate, and putting a short piece of pencil on it, covered it with another slate; I heard the scratching going on, and apparently between the slates, and on removing the top slate there was written "Yes," a satisfactory answer to my question.

"Now," says the doctor, "we will let your friend write as he pleases;" and putting the slates together as before, the writing commenced at once, and the slates were put on my left shoulder, and I, resting my ear down on them, could plainly hear what I supposed was the writing going on. When the communication was finished I heard three raps, which the doctor said intimated that the writing was completed. On opening the slates, I found them all written over with a communication addressed to "Dear father," and signed "Willie," a son of mine who died two years ago.

Now, there is a class of reasoners who will hold that I must explain how that writing took place between those closed slates or else I must concede it was done by spirits out of the flesh. Such kind of logic as this is of the most fallacious kind, for it plainly implies that there is no other way by which the communication could possibly come—the loosest kind of reasoning, in which the ergo does not follow.

Of course, I do not claim to know how the writing was done, but I am satisfied that I hav more reason to think the doctor wrote the entire communication before the slates were closed than I hav that it was done bv my departed son.

Mr. Burr says: "Then he took my slate and began to write on it, saying, 'This is not what you came for, but I am impelled to write.'" He says further on: "What he himself had written I saw him rub out before coming to the test. The slates were clear as he put them together." Now, here, in my opinion, was just the point where Mr. Burr was most woefully deceived, and I hav no doubt, after due reflection, he will acknowledge the possibility of such an event. If he had followed to the letter the recommendation of Mrs. Slenker, I do not believe he would hav obtained any writing on his slates.

The same thing was played upon me by Dr. Slade. He filled a slate full before he tried the test, and, as I then supposed, rubbed it out; but I am now fully persuaded that the rubbing-out process was all a farce, in which I was gulled. Tie together your slates with a pencil between them before you come into the presence of the medium, and keep them so tied, and you will never get any writing done between them, Mr. Burr. W. F. T.

Spiritualism Considered in the Abstract.

In The Truth Seeker of May 5th, Mr. W. E. Brown requests me to answer several questions. I may not be able to answer a single one of these questions to his satisfaction. I am only a student, an investigator, of these things myself; yet I hav learned to distinguish the difference between knowledge and belief; and I will endeavor to answer his questions, without relating the facts and evidence, in this article, on which my knowledge, in one case, or belief, in another, is founded.

I know spirit life is, by evidence of a variety of facts observed; but because I know spirit life is, is no reason why I should be able to answer any or all of his questions from knowledge.

Truth, or its approximation, as near as possible, should be the object of all research and investigation.

That which givs life to the earth body, and passes out of it in what is called death, retaining all the characteristics manifested while in the earth body, is what is called the spirit of a person; but I am inclined to think that what is called the spirit is the body of the real being, which has always existed in some shape or form, whether conscious or unconscious of life. This preëxistence to me is a matter of speculation, as I hav no knowledge on this subject. Yet it is a field for research. It may be inaccessible to man and it may not, but the fact of life after so-called death has been often demonstrated, and is demonstrable.

There is evidence that the spirit body grows with the earth body. The spirit body may hav had its beginning with the earth body; I do not know. If it had, it will be likely to hav its end, as I hav learned, where I find one end, to look for another; but I know the end extends beyond the decay of the earth body.

I believe these remarks cover the subjects of Mr. Brown's questions. I hav not the time at present to extend this article to giv facts and reasoning for the answers I hav given.

I will be greatly obliged to Mrs. Ella E. Gibson if she will write up for The Truth Seeker the particulars of each phase of the manifestations about her, and how she accounts for these phenomena. What is the cause of them?

I ask no one to believe what I write. My object is to stir up inquiry and investigation.

Now, if Materialists generally will investigate these phenomena from a scientific standpoint, as all facts in nature should be investigated, in a few years the science of Spiritology will be established on facts as well known as those of any other science.

And I here present for the consideration of radical Spiritualists the use of the term Spiritology, instead of Spiritualism, by those who hav progressed beyond the religious idea, and who accept spirit phenomena as establishing a science as free from religious mixture as any other science. What Is the Bible?

A book which the orthodox Christian church will scarcely welcome has just been issued by the Scribners, with the above title. The question has been asked a great many times, and answered in a variety of ways, but the author of this volume, who is a doctor of divinity as well as the professor of philosophy in Yale University, replies from the standpoint of a "liberal Christian"—that is, a man too scientific and well instructed to accept the current Christian notion of the book, but who yet retains a sufficient quantity of the dregs of an early education to desire to hold in his thought a saving clause for the venerable collection of fables. Professor Ladd distinctly announces that he is a Christian, and that his researches and conclusions are not undertaken and formed in antagonism to the Bible, and after this proceeds to tell his brethren what the Bible is, or rather what it is not. It is with the latter phase that we are chiefly concerned, for every man of common sense, when he finds the Bible is not what it pretends to be, will giv up his superstitious belief therein, and value it only as he values other books which hav helped or harmed him.

Professor Ladd's philosophical position, and the fact that he is a Christian and a friend to the church as well as to the Bible, will with Christians giv a weight to his statements of historical and analytical truths that they would refuse to a Freethinker. And if they are capable of forming correct conclusions from undisputed premises, the result of reading this book will not be what the author desires. We propose to epitomize the statements of this professor of philosophy, doctor of divinity, and good Christian, for the benefit of such of his unlearned brethren as may be induced to read them.

First and foremost, he says in reply to the question, What is the Bible? that we can never learn this from the Bible itself, for that book does not undertake to explain itself. Instead of being a coherent, united, and single production of a divine author, it "is really a collection of books separated by centuries of time. Moreover, it was centuries before the collection itself united into a whole by the action and usage of the Christian church. A theory of the inspiration of the Bible in the sense we are accustomed to attach to these words could not originate, therefore, until some time after the Christian era." Philo, who is taken by Mr. Ladd to represent the views prevalent about the time of the Christian era, derived his opinion of inspiration from the Platonic philosophers. This was that every notably wise man is inspired. The inspiration of the council of seventy was, according to him, nothing more than extraordinary wisdom. In early times, in the ignorance of the race, all superiority was given a supernatural origin. With how much truth, the world now knows. Professor Ladd therefore pronounces the theory of prophetic ecstasy as a condition of inspiration, the theory of a divine suggestion of all and particular of the scriptural books, as well as the theory of a special infallible inspiration operating within the minds of a select few, untenable and unsupported by any fact whatever. The plenary inspiration of the Bible, in any sense, must be given up.

Mr. Ladd denies, and emphasizes his denial with italics, that the Bible is the word of God. Dogmatic identification of the Bible and the word of God, he says, has never been attempted except by the post-Reformation theory of biblical inspiration. Where Professor Ladd obtains the "word of God" with which to compare the Bible is not for us to inquire. The Old Testament is as well sustained historically as the New, and he cannot accept the latter and reject the former. Neither can it be claimed that the Bible and science agree. For biblical science, for instance, to tell geology or astronomy what it must discover the rocks or stars to be, because the biblical account of creation means thus and so, is condemned by Professor Ladd as impertinent. The Hebrews shared the ignorance of the methods, conceptions, and conclusions of modern physical science which characterized all the ancient oriental peoples. And as the Hebrews, and not God, wrote the Bible, its ignorance and blunders cannot be laid at God's door. If the authority of the Bible is extended so as to cover matters dealt with by the sciences of nature, it is inevitable that these sciences and the Bible will come into conflict. Throughout the Old Testament the phenomena of the earth and sky are conceived of in the most primitiv fashion, and to interpret these conceptions in any mystical or evasiv fashion is unjustifiable. Science never had any existence among the Hebrews in the Old Testament time. The biblical writers knew no more than others of the order, laws, and resultants of physical causes. There is not an atom of evidence to show that they had any other information concerning the truths of nature than such as belonged to all their contemporaries. The chaos of which Genesis speaks had its counterpart in the cosmogonies of surrounding nations existing long previous to this account. The division of time into weeks or periods of seven days existed for an indefinitly long time before the narrativ originated. The act of creation in six successiv days was a tradition in many nations before the Hebrews claimed it as peculiar to their God. Man is always rated as the last formed creature; most of the traditions recognize his formation from the soil, and some of them also recognize the formation of woman from one of man's bodily members. In none of these features, then, can the Hebrew narrativ be said to be peculiar.

The details of the creation, too, can by no stretch of liberal interpretation be reconciled with modern science, which must be admitted to be accurate. The narrativ of Genesis introduces all the forms of plant-life together in verse 12; all the forms of fishes and birds in verse 20; all the forms of land animals in verse 24 and following; it makes these creatures belong to different, separate periods of time, and to different creativ acts. But such a view is quite at variance with the conclusions of modern science. Nor can modern science admit that all the forms of plant-life were created before the existence of sunlight, or that the separation of all plant-life from all animal life—with an entire period or eon thrown in between—represents the real facts of the case. Genesis also speaks of a mass of raging waters; modern science, of a gaseous fluid. The immense antiquity of the heavenly bodies, too, is one of the firmest conclusions of science. But an age for them beyond the few thousand years allowed by the Bible, disputes the book as clearly as the difference between water and a gaseous fluid. Hence various hypotheses of reconciliation. But, says Professor Ladd, there are special objections to each of these hypotheses upon which each strikes and is broken in pieces. One objection, and one that is insurmountable, and does away with the necessity of others, is the fact that the Hebrew word for day cannot be translated to mean a long period. The word, says Professor Ladd, never means, and cannot mean, an indefinitly long or a vast period of time, such as is absolutely required to constitute one of the geological eras.

Again, Professor Ladd finds—and remember that he is all the time defending the book—that the histories recorded by the Bible are not to be depended upon at all. There no doubt exists, he says, a very natural disinclination on the part of many devout readers of the Bible to admit that any of its statements of historical facts are not strictly accurate. That errors do exist, however, hundreds of them, the professor candidly admits. Even the gospels, which he regards with extreme tenderness, are full of discrepancies and errors. This is owing to the entrance into the Bible of mythical and legendary narrativ. Genesis is nearly all legendary. The first pair is a legend widely disseminated among nations of antiquity. The Garden of Eden is a myth. The story of the temptation and fall is also traditionary. Nearly all of the first eleven chapters of Genesis is not only unhistorical but impossible. Of the authorship of these books, and others, we know nothing, and, says Professor Ladd, we shall probably never be able to tell who wrote most of the Hebrew Bible, or at what date most of its books came into existence. For this opinion the professor cites all the scholars of the church as well as the Rationalistic school, as being in agreement.

The New Testament, too, is found to be full of discrepancies, which the professor is too honest to deny, though he is not sufficiently frank to note all the objections raised to the Synoptic gospels. But his desire to conceal that which throws discredit upon the authenticity of the books but emphasizes those admissions wrung reluctantly from him. The Synoptic (first three) gospels are made up, he says, from oral tradition, material from previously written documents, and material "that comes from reflection, or is due to the linguistic and other peculiarities of the author. The order in which they arose is uncertain. As in the case of the Hexateuch [the first six books of the Old Testament] so in the case of these, we shall probably never be able to reconstruct in theory the exact process of oral and written composition which has entered into each."

That is to say, we do not know anything about them. They are the stories of tradition, supplemented with the "reflections" of the scribe who put them on paper we don't know when. Professor Ladd goes on: "Of many of the biblical books we do not know, and never shall know, the authors. The Bible is in reality a collection of writings of a widely diverse origin, with very different characteristics and degrees of value. It is especially true of the Old Testament that no amount of critical and historical study will ever enable the world of scholars to tell in detail how its canon came to be formed. The traditions of the Jews on this subject are made up of untrustworthy stories and myths." The canon of the New Testament is even more muddled and uncertain. The books composing the New Testament were unknown till after the middle of the second century, and at first the work of the so-called scholars was confined to proving their genuinness, a task they could not accomplish. It was not till the close of the century that the present books were received as canonical, and this was an oral tradition, a most unsatisfactory "proof." But even later the equal authority of other books was supported by many of the churchmen. From the time of Augustine "onward for centuries an unhistorical and unscrupulous spirit held almost unbroken sway. The question of the canon and the question what is true biblical teaching, came to be determined by an irrational appeal to the dogmas of the church fathers, without any sincere and thorough attempt to investigate the grounds of a true answer to either of these questions."

There is no room to doubt, says Professor Ladd, as to the general fact that numerous variations and corruptions exist in the present text of the Bible. As far back as we can go in the history of the church it has ever been the same. Of the Old Testament, the oldest manuscripts extant are not older than the thirteenth and twelfth centuries after Christ. The oldest are the Septuagint and the Samaritan Pentateuch; but these vary most from the Masoretic text. The three Greek translations of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus are not concordant. The Syriac, when independent of the Septuagint, differs in places so widely that it seems to be a translation of another form of the Hebrew. It is calculated that the Septuagint differs from the Hebrew and accords with the Samaritan Pentateuch in about one thousand places; that about the same number of reverse cases occur; while in certain other cases the Septuagint stands alone. Of the New Testament, the original manuscripts were never seen. Nobody knows who wrote them; nobody knows how they were written. There are, says Professor Ladd, probably a hundred thousand errors in the text, many of them serious, and a few very important. Marginal notes hav crept into the text, words hav been omitted, or inserted, or their order varied, and changes in spelling are numerous. Some errors are due to the fact that the eye of the scribe wandered from the end of one to the end of another of two clauses ending with the same words, in such a way as to cause the omission of the intervening words. Vowels and diphthongs having similar sounds are confused, where the writing has apparently been from dictation. No form of words at all approaching a standard of infallible accuracy has been preserved. There is a wide-spread and irremovable uncertainty concerning the text of the Old and New Testaments.

These are indisputable facts, and should set the Christian who slavishly follows the Bible to thinking. Professor Ladd is a prejudiced writer, and he has understated the unhistorical and corrupt character of the scriptures. Leaving aside the doctrinal absurdities and cruelties of the Bible, the legendary and mythical history of the book should deter any honest investigator from placing his faith upon it. It is better not to believe so much than to believe so much that is not so.

Who Are They?

Persistent inquiry from a number of our friends induces us to print these two paragraphs for the purpose of finding out who these men are. It may not be flattering to Messrs. Caldwell and Merriman, but really it appears that their claims to hav once been Infidels is all the distinction they ever achieved. The first paragraph is from the Indianapolis News of April 30th:

"PARKERSBURG, W. VA., April 30th.—Hon. Chas. T. Caldwell, until recently known throughout the country as the 'Ingersoll of the West Virginia bar,' from his known Infidelity to the Christian religion, and who was recently converted by the preaching of Evangelist Simons, has taken local ministerial orders. He preached his first sermon yesterday morning in the Methodist Episcopal Church South in this city, to an unusually large and critical audience. The sermon was a masterly effort, abounding in beautiful similes, appeals of touching pathos, and logical deductions. The large congregation, many of whom were old friends and companions of Caldwell in the old life, expressed the utmost astonishment and wonder at his extraordinary talent and ability as a teacher of the gospel. Caldwell will shortly discontinue the practice of law and enter his new field of labor."

The second paragraph is from the Annistown, Ala., Watchman, of the same date:

"Rev. James A. Merryman, one of the founders of the Orphans' Home and Reform School, of Birmingham, is in the city for the purpose of lecturing for the benefit of the school. Mr. Merryman for twenty years lived the life of an Infidel and was the intimate friend of Colonel Ingersoll, but about a year ago he reformed, was admitted to the ministry, and has since lived a Christian life. He will lecture to-night in the Salvation Army Barracks. Twenty-five cents admission will be charged. Subject:—Phil. iii, 8."

If anybody ever heard of these gentlemen when they were Infidels, and knows of their ever doing anything for liberty of thought, the information will be thankfully received at this office.

The Parnellites and the Pope.

It is encouraging to note that the Irish political leaders hav spunked up sufficiently to snub his holiness of the Vatican, and to invite him, in polite phrase, to mind his own business. The Irish, or any other nationality, or municipality, are entitled to home rule, and whatever we may think of the methods of the Parnellites or their English opponents, the conduct of the Irish political campaign is no affair of the pope. That the Irish members of Parliament, after thoroughly discussing the papal rescript, should come to this conclusion, and publish their opinion, is encouraging.

The manifesto issued by the Irish members contains three points. The first is that the pope knows nothing about Irish affairs; second, that he is on the side of the oppressors; and third, that in all political matters the Irishmen desire to be let alone. The allegations of fact put forth in the papal rescript, says the manifesto, are not facts at all, and could hav been so considered by his holiness for no other reason than that he obtained them from a source hostil to Irish autonomy. No freedom of contract in land-leasing exists in Ireland, and over one hundred contracts hav been broken by Tory law on the ground that they were one-sided, and therefore contrary to public policy. In boycotting tyrannical landlords the Irish are but using the only means they possess to procure justice.

So say the Parnellites, and they may be right. If the landlords, by virtue of ownership of the soil, take the high and mighty position that they may charge what they like for its occupancy, so may the tenants, by virtue of their ownership of themselvs, refuse to work for, buy of, sell to, or hold intercourse with the landlords. One side has the same natural right to be independent as the other. By his orders to the people, the pope placed himself on the side of wealth, power, conservatism, and tyranny. His action was in harmony with the history of the church, though there may be more behind it than now appears. Leo desires temporal power over the portion of Italy formerly known as the papal states. Perhaps England will help him obtain it if he helps her to subdue the political revolt of her Irish subjects.

It is one thing, however, to sell a people, and another to deliver the goods. An Irishman is sometimes obstinate, and possibly he will refuse to recognize politics as a part of religious morals.

How Is This, Messrs. Buckley and Du Puy?

The Sun, of this city, on the 19th inst. alleged:

"In printing a recent edition of the daily Christian Advocate, the official organ of the Methodist General Conference, work was performed at the establishment of the Methodist Book Concern in the early hours of the holy Sabbath morning. Yet the printing and sale of Sunday newspapers has been a thorn in the flesh of the Methodist brethren who are now in session at the Metropolitan Opera House. They hav declaimed bitterly against the Sunday press, and urged that it is a strong cause of religious indifference in large cities. Yet the brethren of the Book Concern found it convenient to employ some of the Sabbath's sacred hours for the printing of the Advocate. They admit that the work could hav been done Monday morning, but it would hav been a great bother."

The Advocate establishment in this city is presided over by J. M. Buckley, editor of the weekly journal, who has as associate editor W. H. Du Puy. Mr. Du Puy is the gentleman upon whom falls the extra editorial work, such as supervising the production of the cyclopedia and looking after the Advocate when Mr. Buckley is away. Before the General Conference convened in this city the weekly Advocate announced that a daily Advocate would appear during the conference, edited by Mr. Du Puy. It has appeared, and now the city is astonished to find that some of the mechanical labor upon it has been performed on Sunday. Perhaps some of the editorial work has also been done upon that day.

This reveals the grossest hypocrisy upon the part of Messrs. Buckley and Du Puy. The Methodists are tremendous sticklers for the "holy Sabbath," the Advocate has been an uncompromising foe of even the smallest infraction of the day's "holiness," and Buckley and Du Puy are Methodists of the Methodists in upholding Sabbath observance. Even traveling on Sunday to reach an appointment to preach has been condemned by them.

Yet now, to save a little bother, we find them allowing a daily edition of their paper to be printed on Sunday. Will they ever hav the face to again talk for the sanctity of the day? "Thou hypocrit, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye."

A United States Sunday Law.

Mr. Henry W. Blair, a survival of New England Puritanism which New Hampshire has sent to the United States Senate, has introduced in that body "a bill to secure to the people the enjoyment of the first day of the week, commonly known as the Lord's day, as a day of rest, and to promote its observance as a day of religious worship." It provides that no person or corporation shall perform or authorize to be performed any secular work, labor, or business to the disturbance of others (works of necessity, mercy, and humanity excepted), nor shall any person engage in any play, game, amusement, or recreation to the disturbance of others, on the Lord's day in any place subject to the exclusiv jurisdiction of the United States. It is made unlawful for any person or corporation to receive pay for labor or service rendered in violation of this provision. Section 2 reads:

"No mails shall hereafter be transported in time of peace over any land postal route, nor shall any mail matter be collected, assorted, handled, or delivered, during the first day of the week; provided that whenever any letter shall relate to a work of necessity or mercy, or shall concern the health, life, or decease of any person, and the fact shall be plainly stated upon the face of the envelope, the postmaster-general shall provide for the transportation of such letters in packages separate from other mail matter, and shall make regulations for the delivery thereof, the same having been received at its place of destination before the first day of the week, during such limited section of the day as shall best suit the public convenience and least interfere with the due observance of the day as one of worship and rest; and provided further that when there shall hav been an interruption in the due and regular transmission of the mails, it shall be lawful to so far examin the same when delivered as to ascertain if there be no such matter therein for lawful delivery on the first day of the week."

Section 3 declares to be unlawful the prosecution of commerce between the states and Indian tribes on Sunday, and provides that all persons violating the provision shall be liable to a fine of from $10 to $1.000.

Section 4 prohibits all military and naval drills and parades in time of peace, except assemblies for religious worship of persons in the military service of the United States on the Lord's day.

An additional section provides that labor or service rendered on the first day of the week in consequence of accident, disaster, or unavoidable delays in making the regular communication upon postal and transportation routes, the preservation of perishable and exposed property, and the regular and necessary transportation and delivery of articles of food in condition for healthy use, and such transportation for short distances from one state into another as by local laws shall be declared to be necessary for the public good, shall not be deemed violations of the act, but shall be construed as far as possible to secure to the whole people rest from toil during the first day of the week.

The reporter forwarding this synopsis says the senators smiled considerably when the title of Mr. Blair's bill was read, and one of them said that it was truly wonderful what an industrious man Mr. Blair is in the interests of humanity and good morals. There is, we should judge, small probability of the bill becoming a law at present, but it serves admirably to show what the churches want, and what they will hav if money, lobbying ability, and church influence can secure it.

Editorial Notes.

SEVERAL months hav elapsed since a religious correspondent has sent an account of the punishment of a blasphemer, but here is one that will probably reappear in every pious paper in the country: "Seneca, Kan., May 6th.—On Thursday afternoon two farmers named Brimley, living north of this place, quarreled with a farm hand named Althaus regarding the taking of the sacrament. Althaus, they assert, made a blasphemous remark, and almost before the words had left his lips went suddenly insane, rushing about the farm with fearful groans. The two farmers endeavored to hold him, but he escaped and ran toward the woods along the banks of the Nenecha river, where he was lost." Some Freethinker in the neighborhood should hunt up the author of this and tell him what a liar he is.

IN the canvass for bishops of the church the Methodist delegates now assembled in general conference hav developed remarkable political ability. They canvass and log-roll just like the members of Congress on a harbor and river appropriation, and they would undoubtedly hold public caucuses if the church practice permitted. As it is, their caucuses are little private affairs, held in delegates' rooms and in the lobby of the Opera House, but these are exceedingly numerous and not a little vicious, if the delegates who are left out are to be believed. Charges are made in open session that the law of the church that bishops shall be elected without preliminary canvassing has been broken by the friends of all the candidates, and the charges are not made in the most kindly spirit. The delegates seem to be about like other men, anxious to hav their own way, and not always particular how they get it. A heathen who should be taken to the hall and told that the assembly was composed of teachers of charity, honor, peace, and love would probably laugh at his informant, and intimate that if this was the best Christianity could do practically he would rest content in his heathen superstition.

THE Infidels of Toronto are hopeful that the Canadian government will rescind its former action in refusing them a charter for their publication company, and arrangements are being made for a hearing at the proper office. Mr. Watts has issued an open letter to the government in which he contends that Christianity is not the law of Canada, and that if it were, the withers of his company are still unwrung, as Secularism is not necessarily opposed to Christianity. We hesitate to take issue with Mr. Watts, but if Canada is not a Christian country, we trust that none will ever appear on the globe. A country whose official dictum is that Ingersoll's defensiv speech in a blasphemy prosecution is obscene is, in our opinion, low enough in the scale of intelligence to be rightfully called Christian. And while Secularism, perhaps, does not antagonize a particular church, the attention to the affairs of this world does certainly antagonize, by implication and example, any religion which contends that the chief and highest end of man is to glorify God and fully enjoy him forever, as the catechism has it. So long as Christianity regards a right preparation for heaven as of more importance than a happy existence here, Secularism must necessarily be its open opponent.

Letters from Friends.

STRASBURG, ILL., April 25. 1888.

MR. EDITOR: With joy exceeding that of a Methodist deacon, I write to tell you, it has happened again! Mr. Remsburg gave his two popular lectures, "The Apostle of Liberty" and "Bible Morals," as announced last week. The school-house was filled, standing-room being at a premium each night. A wreath of flowers and thirteen stars swung above the rostrum; beneath them, "U. M. L." The school-children interpreted this to mean: "You Methodists, look out." The Methodists hav undertaken to convert the burg, but gave the people to understand the first night they held meetings here that they did not want to talk to unbelievers, and asked God to forgiv them if they did. Last night as we were about to adjourn a Methodist of the male persuasion elbowed his way to the center of the house, jumped upon a bench, and said, "Be quiet just a minute; there will be preaching here to-morrow night." The clerk went him one better by announcing that Saturday night and Sunday Brother Waginor, of the hardshell Baptists, would preach here. This morning, after paying all expenses, we hav $8.20 on hand.

NEW BEDFORD, PA., April 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Grover is right on the Catholic question. I hav urged the same views for many years. Men who regard their obligations to any other organization, person, or power, foreign or otherwise, as higher than that which they owe this government, even after they hav taken the oath of allegiance, should not be allowed to take the oath. Now, every good Catholic so regards his obligations. With him the church and its authorities stand far above all other governments, principalities, or powers. And he swears with this reservation. Such an oath is a fraud; it is perjury pure and simple. If we still continue to import by the million the dregs of Catholic Europe and clothe them with citizenship they will soon control our whole country, as they now do many of our cities. They will then change our Constitution and laws, abolish our free and establish their parochial schools, etc. Then our liberties are overthrown, or only preserved through blood and carnage. In my youth the Protestant and Catholic churches were bitterly hostil to one another. But it is manifest now, as Liberalism grows, and threatens to become a power of sufficient strength to overthrow their mutually cherished superstitions, many of the Protestant leaders are making peace with Catholicism, and preparing, when the irrepressible conflict culminates, and the great battle between science and superstition is being fought, to stand shoulder to shoulder and fight in the ranks of their former enemy against light, liberty, and Liberalism.

Yours truly, W. W. WALKER.

SAN JOSÉ, CAL., April 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed a copy of the report of Mr. Putnam's work in San José on the 22d instant, as it appears in the Mercury:

The afternoon lecture on "Dangers Ahead" was ably handled. I wish every citizen in San José could hav heard it. He proved that as a nation we are not acting in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, and gave numberless reasons for the necessity of organizing auxiliaries to the American Secular Union, whose fundamental basis is the Nine Demands of Liberalism, which demand a total separation of church and state. He quoted from Franklin the following sentiment: "We hold that the only guarantee of religious or civil liberty is the absolute divorce of church and state;" from James A. Garfield, who said, "The divorce between church and state ought to be absolute;" from George Washington, who said, "The government is in no sense founded on the Christian religion;" from Grant, who said, "Keep church and state forever separate." He proved that danger threatens our government and that we should be up and doing. The evening lecture on the "Glory of Infidelity" was a masterly effort. He stated that "the title of Infidel is one that has been bestowed upon us by the Christian world; we do not call ourselvs Infidels, we call ourselvs Freethinkers; but we are willing to accept the title they hav given us," etc. At the close an organization was effected and the following temporary officers were elected: President, Mr. Woodhams, of Santa Clara; secretary, Mrs. R. H. Schwartz; committee on by-laws, Messrs. Magenheimer, Titus, Kappitz, and Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Schwartz. All felt that they had spent a profitable day.

The appointed committee of five—viz., temporary president, A. S. Woodhams; secretary, Mrs. R. H. Schwartz; Messrs. Magenheimer, Schwartz, and Pobritz—met Sunday evening, April 29th. Mr. Woodhams being absent, R. H. Schwartz was appointed chairman. It being found necessary to make some addition to the constitution and by-laws, a committee was appointed to attend to that matter. Mr. Vostrowsky, Anna Vostrowsky, and Mr. Scheneman were present. There were ten in all. The money was raised to send for the charter, and will go to Secretary Stevens by the same mail that takes this to you. You will see by this that the Secular Union of San José has made a fair start. I hope to be able to report rapid progress in the near future.

MRS. R. H. SCHWARTZ, Temporary Secretary.

TALENT, ORE., May 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: "I still liv," and suffer with and for inherited ailments and early false education and wrong habits. It being too wet in Washington territory, I came here to this beautiful and fruitful valley, where I may conclude to stop. I am alone in a board house, eight hundred feet above and three miles from Talent. The young man, Mr. Herman Stock, who owns the house, very kindly givs me the use of it for a while. On his door it reads, "No preachers admitted except on business." Mr. Breese, Mr. Dean, Mr. Holton, and their wives are very kind to me. They and a few others seem to be pervaded by a spirit of truth, humanity, and help-each-other life. All subjects are discussed, dissected, and criticised in their meetings with a freedom and earnestness that promis much good to the young, and the ignorant and stupid world around them. Over the door on the outside of the meeting-room it reads, "U. M. L. Hall." As a contrast, over the entrance to every orthodox church it might appropriately read, "Universal Mental Slavery." Attached to the hall is a room in which the Sunday-school is taught, and in which for two months past a successful Secular school has been taught. Both of these schools are under the instruction and guidance of Mr. W. J. Dean, a very intelligent, progressiv, and deep Freethinker, and Miss Rosetta Waters, an able musician, a very kind, enthusiastic, and efficient teacher. In both schools the pupils are taught facts of nature, demonstrated as obvious truths, and the creeds and dogmas of Godism, mythology, a false cosmogony, and priestcraft are, as far as possible, kept out of the pupil's mind. The hall is most beautifully, tastefully, and appropriately arranged and decorated. Over the back of the stage it reads, "Seek the truth." Over the front in white letters on blue ground is the word, "Liberty." On one side of the hall it reads: "To do justice to mankind, scorn the priest and free the mind." On the other side it reads, "Reason be your guide, and truth your pride." On the front end it reads, "In science we trust." The pictures of Paine, Bennett, and Ingersoll hang upon the walls.

There seems to me, so far, to be more freedom and toleration of speech, and more promis for practical reforms and how to make the most of life, than is to be seen and heard in most halls where the motto is U. M. L. The day for universal mental liberty in all its practical significance has not yet arrived. As a motto and watchword, it is well to adopt and to work for and toward it as fast as possible.

ANDOVER, KAN., May 2, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Freethought is slow work here, but most people can see a change. Christians do not ask Infidels any more for money, which is quite a change from four or five years ago. At that time we generally leaned that way.

Hav had the pleasure of attending court at Eldorado, as petit juror, there to see justice meted out to anxious penitents; whilst there made some acquaintances. I had several discussions, as the town is generally run by Christians, including the Salvation Army. I made some offers to their clergymen, also to "Captain Adair," that I would place $100 in their banks to their credit if they would prove that there was an entity that lived after the dissolution of the body, and that there was a God to save or damn it. But as yet no one has applied. I am by no means flush with money, but to Salvation people, if they would turn their barracks of ignorance and superstition into a school-house to educate, I would giv $10 to start with, whilst they, for their cause, get from thirty-five to seventy-five cents by hard coaxing and abusing the citizens.

In a conversation with several jurymen, at the National Hotel, to down Infidelity they said that all the occupants in the jail were the kind that made up our crowd, and just then I offered to wager my jury fees that they were either Christians or they believed in the divinity of Christ. And on going to the court house, on information volunteered by Deputy-Sheriff Dodson, the case was decided my way.

In an argument with another gentleman, who believed that the Bible was inspired, every word of it, and believed that those who did not believe were bad men, and that the authorities and citizens of Eldorado would do me justice by putting me in jail, I kindly informed him that if we lived in New Jersey they certainly would; then I asked him many puzzling questions.

C. B. Reynolds's lectures here last winter, on "Life's Duties" and "What Liberalism Teaches," ought to be printed in pamphlet form and distributed throughout the land, sent to every house, and read by every man, woman and child that can read. It would not be long then till the eighty per cent of the American people that can read would be free from superstition, and the other twenty per cent would, of course, be Christians. And then would be produced the greatest funeral homily that the world has ever seen, and that would be to their dead book, the Bible.

I hav promised my friends—jurymen each one—to exchange papers. Hav mailed them some old copies, for which in return I hav got an armful of Christian papers.

Yours very respectfully, A. M. WOLF.

WALNUT GROVE, KAN., April 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am trying to pick up a subscriber wherever I can find one, but times are very hard here, as the failure of our crops makes it much worse than you could imagin. But there are some that I will get as soon as they can spare the stamps to pay for your paper. They like the sentiments of the contributors, and those cartoons are dead shots on theology. The very pious Christians of our place hate those pictures as badly as the devil hates holy water. And the poor sky-pilots like me about the same. I don't take any pains to keep the papers out of sight. I like to talk to the good, pious church-members and get into an argument with them; then I get the holy Bible, God's precious word, and some of those very ridiculous passages found there, and see them stare at me. Then I just let them read for themselvs; I giv them the book, chapter, and verse as a reference to take home to read at their leisure time and reason on with themselvs, and do their own thinking with.

They will hav the preacher at this post as captain to command at the next round-up, as I call their annual dress-parade, next winter; as they hav to muster all their forces once a year, so that they can make a fine display of their troops. But they hav not recruited very fast in the last year. They hav lost some by desertion, and some hav gone to other pastures, so they try and swap around and try to warm over a few of other sects to keep up the rolls, so that they can draw rations for the captains and non-commissioned officers. They squeeze all of the soft members, and then beg the rest from the ungodly sinners. The Methodists are the greatest beggars, especially the preachers and the ladies of the church. The male portion are getting scarce all the time. The members think if I should leave this place they could do something. I was talking of going to Colorado; they often ask me when I am going to Colorado. I tell them that I do not know. They think that it would be a benefit to my health to go West, but I do not know as it would; I think that I will stay with them some time longer and try and send you a subscriber once in a while. I will do all that I can for progress, free speech, free thought, and free press, and THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like the paper, the sentiments and grand principles that it advocates—justice, a fair deal and fair play.

Yours truly, WILLIAM H. NOAH, P.M.

CONCORD, N. C., April 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I had occasion a few weeks since to make inquiry of an acquaintance as to the health of a lady friend, whose husband had died a few days previous, as an absence of a letter from her gave fears that she might be sick. I wrote to the pastor of her church. He replied next day, inflicting on me such bosh as the following: "Our only consolation and comfort is in knowing that God doeth all things well, and that our brother is happier with Christ than with us." For a more absurd, unreasonable sentence, one filled to the brim and running over with silliness, I think a premium should be offered. My friend who died left a widow in rather feeble health, and a son of about twelve years. Now let us analyze the reverend gentleman's sentiments as expressed in that one sentence. He says God did a good act in taking away from a loving wife, who has passed the meridian of life by twenty years, a loving and affectionate husband, and placing him in the cold ground. He says God did a good act in depriving a son, a youth of tender years, surrounded by all the snares and thorns of vice, of a kind and loving father, at a time when that son was most in need of good counsel and a father's protection. This, to the Liberal mind, is strange doctrin, but it is in keeping with the absurd church creeds and church and Bible dogmas. "God doeth all things well."

In the cyclone at Mt. Vernon, Ill., when there was no distinction made between saint and sinner, "God did all things well!" In case of a railroad accident, caused by a drunken engineer or conductor, where scores are killed and crippled, "God doeth all things well." In case of an epidemic of yellow fever, when hundreds die and pass to the mythical hell or heaven, "God doeth all things well." When the torrents of rain descend and fill our rivers to overflowing and submerge towns and cities, destroying lives and property, then, in the opinion of my learned church friend, "God doeth all things well." If the tenet held by this learned D.D. is true, why, oh, why should man contend against pestilence, sickness, the ravages of beasts of prey, and the insects which destroy the crops of the tillers of the soil? Why should we not accept and act on the precepts taught in Matt. vi, 34? If any class or sect of men could act out the teaching of the verse quoted, the pastors who get large salaries for giving nothing for something would be about the only persons who could do it, as their manna is showered down on them every day—not, as the manna of the children of Israel was, by God, but from the pockets of the hard-working members of their churches, who often deny themselvs and their families the comforts of life to pay the preachers for ministering to them one day in holy things. And "God doeth all things well."

J. W. MEHAFFEY.

TUSCOLA, ILL., April 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Ever since Mr. C. B. Reynolds's lectures in this city—last Oct. 9th and 10th—it has been my purpose to write you of my impressions of the man and of his work. He was the first man who ever appeared before a Tuscola audience attacking the superstitions and absurdities which hav so long been the woof and warp of orthodoxy and which for ages hav been the forces that hav driven man to the perpetration of every crime. C. B. Reynolds is a "noble old Roman" in the ranks of Freethought. In private conversation or in the forum, fable and falsity, credulity and superstition, are dealt masterly blows and dethroned from the brain of man. His positions are invulnerable; his logic is a two-edged sword. But one of the most marked, and to me the most pleasing, characteristics of the man is his absolute control of temper. In this respect he is certainly entitled to be ranked as the Socrates of the age. Moving, as he does, upon the exalted plane of universal love and charity, he certainly is fulfilling the noble mission placed in his hands to perform. As to his work here, if there be any truth in the saying that "the worse the hurt, the worse the howl," our orthodox friends came near having spasms. A multitude of punishments adequate to the enormity of his offense were indulged in prospectivly, but as the church and the throne hav been divorced, he was beyond their power to punish. All, then, left for them to do was to vilify and malign, the last and only ammunition in the arsenal of their anthropomorphic God.

But notwithstanding ours is a highly rated Wesleyan and Calvinistic community, there are glorious evidences of the rapid strides of Freethought on every hand. With a population of two thousand, the time has been when our town supported six regular sky-pilots, and there still exist six spires reaching almost as high as the place where heaven was located by Moses. But only three ministers now eke out a livelihood, the support of whom comes largely from the non-religious portion of the people, levied in the shape of poor festivals and snide entertainments, in which both extortion and robbery are applauded. Mr. Reynolds left us many good ideas, and the seed sown will bear full fruitage.

Last, but not least, is the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, whose readers are always assured of the honest and sincere thought of candid men; thought which, untrammeled and unrestrained, unhampered and undaunted, carries the mind, Mazeppa-like, above and beyond the narrow creeds to the hights of absolute freedom, where it may roam at will and gather the flowers and fruits of noble, virtuous action.

The pictures by Mr. Heston do not shock our minds, but on the contrary help us to more fully realize the exceeding transparency of the account. C. S. GLASSCO.

ADRIAN, MICH., May 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In regard to C. L. James's grandiloquent depreciation of my article on Anarchy which was printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER some time ago: He refers to the Freethinkers' Magazine; he indirectly accuses me of plagiarism. I acknowledge that I hav read the journal spoken of, and I think it presents much that would benefit my erratic friend. One does not hav to quote from any other source than his own convictions, if he be loyal, to show the fallacy of Anarchy. In regard to the amount of territory subject to homestead, he has but to refer to our land laws. I do not mean to be understood that the government givs away this land, but the amount required is so small to get a title that any honest man, not tinctured with the free-plunder mania, can become a real estate possessor. As was said in my former article, there are thousands of acres of virgin soil that are not occupied. Loyal men do not complain; it is the lazy, disaffected element who find the fault. A man with ordinary caliber who says those Chicago disturbers did not get their just deserts favors the same principles of those unfortunate men. I deny that Anarchy is favored by Ingersoll and others mentioned, as he would hav us believe. Now, Friend James, I did not get my disability in trying to appropriate my neighbors' belongings. Neither do I ask your sympathy. I am possessed of enough common sense to be loyal to the land that gave me birth.

O. S. BARRETT.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., April 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The worthy secretary of the American Secular Union hits the nail right on the head when he says: "Two or three good Liberal workers ought to set orthodoxy out in the cold in any small community." This we know by experience can be done. When I was a boy they used to hold church and Sunday-school almost under my nose, but when I arrived at manhood and began to take an earnest interest in the issues of the day it was quite otherwise. I became full, as it were, and was something like a man from Indiana my father used to tell about that was going into a fight; he said, "Gentlemen, stand back! what I do I shall hav to do quickly, for I'm short-winded." He backed his man out. So it was when we began to open fire on them. We drove them to their fortifications (the town), and out of our range at that time, until their closest point was three miles and a half from us in any direction. Thus I enlarged upon my field until I affected them more or less over the greater portion of Fulton county, Ill. I do not claim all the credit to myself. Alexander Slack, and I don't know how many others, preceded me.

Since we hav come to Kansas, I hav introduced Liberalism over a greater scope of country—Salina, New Cambria, Solomon City, and Concordia, being in three different counties. How hav I done this? Of course, I hav spent some money for pamphlets and tracts; but the greater portion of my introduction of Freethought has been done by sending in the names of those I could recollect to THE TRUTH SEEKER and other papers, that they might send them sample copies.

When we came here we found a church in activ operation within two miles and a half of where we squatted, so you see the orthodox atmosphere was too stifling for one that was not used to it, and I said, "Gentlemen, stand back and giv us a chance to breathe the pure air;" and they had to stand back, and now it is impossible for them to hold regular services, and notwithstanding the church here—Lutheran—is opposed to dancing, they lugged themselvs in with a dancing party and paid for the hall and got up a supper, the church to hav the proceeds of the supper. There were twenty couples out; fifteen went without and five of them took supper. The boys boasted, "That time they made something off the church." The church people's object in this case was "revenue only." In it they failed. Then they fell back on the old plan and started the women out to beg. Where the people had no money they told them they would take eggs, butter, and poultry in lieu thereof; and making quite a collection of the last named, they announced a sale of the above articles. A carpenter they begged of asked them if the minister was sick, and they said No. Said he: "Damn it! let him work for a living, as I do! So there is enough of that!"

As a starter Judge Osborne, Mrs. Abbot, and myself poured hot shot into them in a literary society we held at the New Cambria school-house until they closed the building, which I mentioned a year ago. And I hav given out every Liberal paper that I got hold of ever since.

We learn an anecdote of Judge Osborne at a revival held in a school-house this last winter. They called upon anyone who had a mind to to get up and giv his experience, and as they had not succeeded in getting any converts, and as, as usual, the audience turned their eyes toward the judge as much as to say, That means you—which the judge, from the force of habit, did not doubt in the least—he arose, with a very slow and dignified manner, judge-like, and began to giv his opinion of the revival. The minister said to the judge, "Will you please keep quiet?" "I will not," replied the judge. "This building was built for public instruction; I hav as good a right to instruct the people in this building as you hav. You hav told this congregation what an unprincipled class Infidels are. Now, being an Infidel, I claim the right to tell them what a humbug revivalists are." It is needless to add that they did not get a single convert during the revival. There are two things noticeable in the judge's deportment, viz., he knows when it is a proper time for him to speak, and he is also too well acquainted with forensic methods to be shut off in the way the dominie attempted. He has been too used to ruling the proceedings himself to be shut off in that manner. So there was nothing left for them to do but blow out the lights, which they did.

So I say, with Secretary Stevens, if you believe in the essence of American freedom, it is your duty to inform the orthodox people that we exist, and what we exist for. Do anything and everything that is proper to bring about this desired effect. JOHN W. ABBOTT.

VINELAND, N. J., April 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: One of our local divines, divinely attired, his divine plug wreathed with divine smiles, is going the rounds of our township drumming up converts and a general interest in his particular gospel dispensary. He works one street a day, I believe. Very hard work it must be—almost as hard as canvassing for a less important manufacturer than the one he claims to represent. Now, I liv in such unholy seclusion—among birds and books, and minding my own business generally—I scarcely know the faces of the divine men of this place from those of men not so divinely favored; hence, when my door-bell tinkled—directly after the noonday meal—and the sound of exquisit masculin hilarity reached my (too well-trained) ears, I knew not that something angelic stood without. Glancing at myself in a mirror, I felt the ordeal too tony for my situation. I was rigged in the most dilapidated of my wardrobe, and in untidy familiarity with my aviary of more than 125 birds, whose domain I was engaged in purifying with soap and water. The branches thereof had given my hair a fashionable frizz; the sand thereof had powdered my face not quite so fashionably as to color. The girl who aids me on such occasions had not come yet; I was alone in the house. Ting-a-ling! creak-a-crack! lin-ng! went the bell a second time. "Those beasts will tear that bell down!" I muttered, provoked. "I wonder who they are—perhaps some one I ought to speak with!". Influenced by this possibility, I crossed the front rooms and peered through the blinds. "Humph! canvassers fresh started out! They won't shine like that after a month's vicissitudes! Well, I am glad they hav gone to work; facing honest toilers, twenty or more each day, may rub off some of that snobbery, diminish that air of lofty self-poise, and set them on their feet plain individuals among individuals." Thus my thought. I did not know the two men, but saw what I supposed to be a canvasser's gripsack on the piazza floor at their feet. What else did I see? Shining broadcloth, superfine, such as few of our townsmen can afford to wear; glossy silk hats, superfine; etiolate bosoms representing a good sum for quality of texture, and much labor on the washboard and ironing-slab. I never knew such labor well paid, so when I see a particularly glossy shirt-bosom I feel like pronouncing the wearer indebted for the same, and wonder if the poor girl who manipulated it had muscular strength enough left in her for her stomach to digest essential nourishment afterward, providing she was paid sufficient to procure proper food. But undoubtedly his hired girl, or maybe his wife, shined that bosom, and he growled a few minutes less than a man not so divine would hav done when he thought there might exist a possibility of inciting his inferior servitor to acquire a more super-extra gloss on his future clerical fronts. What so symbolical of super-purity within as a glossy, super-pure, aching-elbow-wrought shirt-front?

By the way, we don't expect generally to make articles etiolate by washing them in blood—not even a lamb's blood—but we don't dispute that the color of some people's souls may look comparativly bleached after such a sozzling. And, now we think of it, would not it look a bit more consistent for the blood-washed elect to wear garments thus purified? Gloss-starch and sulphur bleached linen convey no conception to the untutored brain of murder or slaughter or bloody wallowing of any kind. If preachers would go about dragging a slaughtered lamb by its hind legs, we could never mistake them for common canvassers, nor insult them with such indifferent respect as we so often award the not angelic agent. We should know there was brewing a holy desire to wash us down in a lambkin's sangre azul, and would smother our sensibilities and cry, "Daub it on!"—I—I—mean we should say: "Generous descendant of the followers of Moses's descendant, approach! wash away!"

I noticed his hands were as daintily cared for as his glistening linen collar; that his fine boots shone equally with his broadcloth; his face was freshly barbered; beard blackened and glossed; teeth as white as dentistry can keep them; and his whole tout ensemble far, far beyond anything which the honest mechanics who support the families in my neighborhood can pretend to emulate even in thought. Yea, even in thought, for they work so hard for their small wages, and get so over-weary by the time the home chores are perfected, they find sleep preferable to a play with imagination. Yet do these elegantly attired "angels of grace" go about among the economy-crazed families of these hard laborers soliciting their support! What a phase of human nature! How plainly it illustrates the brass of one class and the worn-in stupidity of another class! Watson Heston's recent pictures on this subject were true to life. The over-cared-for despotic shouter says—by open inference—to the half-starved toiler: "You're poor and needy, but you might be worse off! The Lord has been good to let you learn to work. See, I am a lily of the field whom the Lord wants to liv on the honeys of life. He has taught me how to appeal to his children—how to keep them so at variance with the glories of this world they can find no comfort except in hope—that is, in hoping death will bounce them into more favorable conditions—and if you are good enough to starve yourselvs a little more, or work a little harder, so as to contribute to my support—for if I hav to labor I can't study up dogmas any more than the rest of you—I can assure you those favorable conditions will [soon] be yours to enjoy," etc. And the non-working brain of his over-tried hearer, being incapable of an outflow of strong, honest conviction, accedes to such insidious flattery as the smooth tongue throws in; for if the mental dominion is non est inventus, the power of emotion is not. Vanity and ambition each catch revivifying crumbs from the sanctimonious warbler—the exact result he aims for—and he leaves the humble door victoriously, congratulating himself, "They'll squeeze out $5 toward my salary!"

Well, those "divines" yanked my door-bell so it has not been capable of articulation since, but I was not yanked into their sight. If I had realized it was "angels of mission" that were thus yanking and showing their highly scoured teeth, I think I would hav patterned after Mrs. McFane, an Irish gentlewoman I used to know. She, with strong personal reasons, had great enmity for all priestly quality. One day a Baptist minister, out soliciting church attendance, called her from the wash-tub to the front door. She was sweltering with the heat, steam, and exercise of her employment; her gown was old, wet, and pinned back; her sleeves were rolled up, and her feet were encased with rubbers. She did not look refined, nor feel so.

"Do you attend any church, dear madam?" suavely smirked the "good angel."

"Not to-day!" was the grim response.

"To-day? Oh, no! he, he!" with a flattering glance that spoke volumes as to the genteel appearance he knew she was able to make. "Ah—ah—what church do you attend?"

"What's that to you?" gruffly.

"My dear lady, I long to perform the work of my master, and draw all stray sheep from the wildernesses of doubt and indifference to membership in my fold."

"You're a preacher, hey?"

"I hav been appointed a teacher by the master."

"What master?"

"The Lord—my dear Lord Jesus Christ, whose blood has saved us!"

"Where does he liv?"

"Ma'am!"

"What's his business?"

"Surely, dear lady, this is no theme for jokes!"

"What wages does he pay you fellows?"

"Madam, my congregation pay a liberal salary—"

"You said you worked for a master. I knew you lied. There ain't any man pays his help wages to spread round in clothes like you wear! But if you've got a whole congregation of masters, why, you must find it mince work keeping the right side of 'em all. But since it sums up a big income I s'pose it's all right, and if you stick to dead and gone subjects, and don't meddle with present shortcomings, it'll continue to be all right for you, 'specially if you go round every year drumming in new converts to help economize the drain on their purses. Mind you, I ain't a-goin' to help save 'em a dime, not if the church sinks—steeple and all the congregation."

"I—I—excuse me, madam, for considering your tirade uncalled for!"

"Uncalled for? Beg pardon! I thought you had called to interview me on religion."

"Quite correct, my dearest lady." Very sweetly.

"All right. You step in and rest while I get into some decent clothes that I can feel dignified in. If I was dressed equal to you I'd squelch you with my airs in just two seconds. I ain't fond of tailor-got-up beggars. My husband earns his bread; he'd be 'shamed to shout folks crazy and ask 'em to pay for it. If you'd stop your reasonless cant and teach scientific truths from the pulpit 'at would learn one something 'at's useful to know——

"Going? You must be weak-kneed for a disciple! And not seen me dressed up and on my dignity, either! Well, I can only say you ain't so strong in the dignity of good clothes as I am in a wash dress. La, yes, in dignified garments I'd squelched you in less'n one second! But go on and be happy; you'll find most of the women not only off dignity but too 'shamed to retaliate like I do; they're vain and hate to be thought sluttish and ill-bred too. They'll acquiesce to all you propose, and next Sunday appear at church if only to show you how well they can appear in good clothes, and that they hav dignity as well as you. Humph! rooster, seek out subjects for your harem!"

This little episode made Mrs. McFane famous in our village; it made her many enemies, too—just as inditing this may shape enemies for me—but I never knew a nobler-hearted woman, nor a gentler one. Husband never had better wife, nor children a better mother. Without possessing educational advantage, her life was earnest, thoughtful, and sincere. The mound of earth that marks her resting-place is not all that speaks of what she was, for the noble influence of her activ life continues to sway the lives of others, and will long continue, like incense borne on the wings of time, to reach the sensibilities and control the impulses of generations. Death is not terrible when our good deeds are breathed for the glory of the living. Alas! what good works liv behind the man whose life duty consists in the public shout of "Believe on Jesus! Come to the fount and be saved?"

That minister visited every door, annoying the ladies—who were none of them "attired to feel dignified"—calling them from some unfinished duty, to smirk and smile into their flushed faces, and beg their support, the pomposity of his attitude a dampener to whomsoever felt antagonistic, for we hav few Mrs. McFanes. Said one lady—a Liberalist: "He had the best of the situation. I was ironing, and felt so hot and uncomfortable I had no dignity—not a bit!" Were those two men—Mr. Preacher had a brother with him when he worked our street—posted in the effects of this unequal feeling—the advantage it gave them? Why did not they go thus attired to solicit the work-soiled husbands in their shops? Was it that woman's vanity is peculiarly studied, and she is influenced through it to beg of her husband—who is not liable to refuse a petition from her—the stipend he—the angel at the door—was after? "Angel at the door," indeed! Yours fraternally, M. E. C. FARWELL.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Little Ah Me and Ah There.

Little Ah Me was a Chinaman
With a queue as long as his arm,
Whose spirits seemed constantly under a ban,
Though he never did evil or harm;
But he ever inclined to the darker side,
And his life was a failure, and when he died
The mourners were very few.

Little Ah There was another Chinee,
But one of a different sort.
His face a map of the Land of Glee,
And worries he made his sport;
He had his failings, but he was gay;
He had many a little sin,
But he won all hearts by his cheery way,
And they made him a mandarin!

From little Ah Me and from little Ah There
The lesson sublime is learned
That it's better to keep up a semblance fair
Till it's time to be inurned.
It's seldom a whiner may reach his goal,
While a laugher seldom fails;
Strength breeds itself a bantering soul,
While the one that is hopeless quails.

Never Be Ashamed of Labor.

Work ennobles. It is a beautifier. It is a king. It transforms chaos into order, and makes waste places to blossom like the rose. All honest work is honorable. The hard, brown hand, made so by toil, is the only hand entitled to wear diamonds. The idlers are the disgraceful part of humanity. The workers are the crown of life, and every bit of labor accomplished is a jewel in the diadem upon the brow of a world made better, nobler, and greater by labor.

A story is told of a sailor who, landing at Newport, R. I., once upon a time, and having been paid off for his voyage, stepping upon the dock accosted a plainly dressed man, who stood near, in this way: "Here, sir, want a job?"

"I don't care. What is it?"

"Put this trunk on your shoulder, and follow me."

The man smiled, but obligingly lifted the trunk, which was a not over-sized box, to his shoulder, and followed the pompous sailor up Long Wharf to a third-rate boarding-house.

"Here's your pay, sir," and the sailor proffered a piece of silver.

The man smiled, and said, "Oh, I don't want that. You may hav my service for nothing. I was not particularly engaged, and I would as soon do a favor for you as not."

"Are you not in need of money, sir?" inquired the sailor, surveying the plain attire of the man.

"Well, no; not just now," was the reply.

"Are you well enough off to refuse mony?" and the sailor eyed the man suspiciously.

"Well, I can do a favor for a man sometimes without pay. I own that ship on which you hav been sailing!"

The chagrin of the sailor can be better imagined than described.

Robert Adams had occasion to employ a man at one time on some work that was being done about his store. There was a piece of granit to be moved. Mr. Adams desired the man to place it upon a barrow and wheel it a short distance along a principal thoroughfare.

"I can't do it," said the man decidedly.

"Why not? Is it too heavy?"

"Ah, no; that is not the reason."

"Well, what is the reason?" demanded Mr. Adams.

"I'm not going to wheel that barrow round on Main street! I will not do it."

"Too proud, eh? Is that it? Well, we will get the stone on the barrow—you steady it, and I myself will wheel it. I am not too proud to do it, if you are."

So the spectacle was witnessed of a well-known business man wheeling a barrow along the street, while the hired man walked beside him, looking sheepish enough.

It was a good lesson for him, however, and one that he has never forgotten, and, it is but fair to say, he was never afterward afraid or ashamed to put his hands to any honest labor. He frequently refers to the event, and relates how mortified he was to behold the willingness with which Mr. Adams, a man able to command many thousands of dollars, wheeled the barrow along the street, while he, a common laboring man, thought himself too proud to do, as he wrongly supposed, so menial a service.

He made an inward vow at that time that he would never be guilty of so much foolish pride and egotism again. And he never was.

Correspondence.

OLIVE, CAL., May 3, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As my papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for several years, and likes it very much, I will try and write a short letter for the Children's Corner. I go to school and hav a very good teacher; his name is Mr. Wells. I study the Fourth Reader, writing, spelling, arithmetic, geography, and grammar. We hav a nice library in the school, and an organ, and there is a young lady in our school who plays a march, and the scholars march out at recess and at noon, and we do not hav any recess in the afternoon; we go home at half-past 3 every day.

The vineyards in this section of the state are a failure, and my father has some peaches and figs and oranges, but he has had to cut the tops of them off, for the red scales and the smut and things made the oranges so they did not taste as sweet as they used to. We hav plums and prunes, and a new kind of peach; it is called the saucer peach; they are a flat peach. We hav all kinds of flowers; we hav twelve different kinds of roses, and ten kinds of geraniums. We hav two kinds of blue flag and one kind of white flag. My father has had tomato vines three years old, and not frost enough to kill them. I like to liv in California much better than in Kansas, where my parents used to liv. Winters there are always cold, and here they are summer, classing the two different states together.

ETTA MAY SHOEMAKER.

GRANTFORK, ILL., May 8, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I suppose you, and most of the readers of the Children's Corner, hav read of the misfortune of Mr. and Mrs. R. M. Casey, Seneca, S. C., for whom Mrs. E. D. Slenker made an appeal which you will find in THE TRUTH SEEKER, May 5th, at the bottom of p. 279. Now, I think it would help Mr. Casey a good deal if all of the readers of the Children's Corner would send to Mrs. E. D. Slenker, Snowville, Va, any sum of money they wish to, for "every little helps." And if Mrs. Slenker wishes, she could print the names of the contributors, and the amount sent, in the Children's Corner. I would like to hav Miss Wixon's opinion about my motion. I hav sent some money already to Mrs. Slenker. I see that you hav got up a J. Hacker fund. Did some misfortune befall him, or what is it? I inclose a circular of the famous Diamond Mineral Spring, which is near here. I must close now, remaining,

Your true Freethought friend,
NICHOLAS J. KRAFT.

[Mr. Hacker has been a brave and lifelong worker in the cause of Liberalism. He has not been able to accumulate enough for his support in old age, and now that the infirmities of years are upon him he is very grateful for any little help that may assist in making smooth the pathway for the feeble steps of himself and aged wife. Mr. Casey's call for aid is also a worthy one, and, as little folks may liv to be aged and poor, it is well to remember, and do as we would be done by under like circumstances.—ED. C. C.]

COIN, WASH., May 5, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my second letter to the Children's Corner. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and thinks it is a very nice paper.

We liv about half-way between Sprague and Colfax, and about eight miles from Coin post-office. Our nearest railroad station is Endicott, which is about twelve miles from here.

My father is up in Montana working in a quartz mill, and my oldest sister is also up there.

I hav five sisters and four brothers. The youngest is nearly four years old.

I am going to school now. We liv about a quarter of a mile from the school-house. I study writing, arithmetic, grammar, history, physiology, dictionary, and geography. I don't suppose you will think there is very much grammar about my letter, but I am just a new beginner in it and don't know much about it yet. My teacher's name is Miss Whiteline, and I like her real well.

Hav you any of your photographs you will let me hav? If you will let me hav one, I will be greatly pleased.

Won't some of the readers of the Children's Corner please write to me? I mean some of about my own age, which is fifteen years. I would be greatly pleased to hav a Liberal correspondent.

Well, I think this is long enough for the second letter. I will close.

From your Liberal friend,
FLORENCE E. WHITE.

P S.—I will send you one of my cards, and I hope you will think it is pretty. F. W.

[Thanks for the card. It is very pretty indeed.—ED. C. C.]

CAMP WOOD, ARIZ., April 24, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am prompted to write a true story, and would like to see it in the Children's Corner. When I was a child, I lived awhile with one of the best friends to children that I ever knew. He was then, as he is now, a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. There was no Children's Corner in it then. I hav now grown to womanhood, am married, but still I am girlish, so much so that I sometimes invite several girls, my old associates, to visit our old friend, who has now grown quite aged. His family are all scattered out, with homes for themselvs, except his good wife, whose years are like his, much beyond threescore. We love to visit him, because he so often visited us at our school, and always had words of good cheer every time he came.

He has a beautiful home, made beautiful by his own hands. Twenty years ago he called it "Charming Dale," and truly it is a charming place. Scores of children visit him every summer, and he is never so delighted as when they feast on his plums, cherries, melons, and other fruits. But to show that we appreciated our aged friends more than we did the delicious fruits, we made a visit in early spring. After dinner, Grandpa Rogers—for you must know that is what we all call him—asked us to go with him to the big barn, where he had some men shearing goats. We all went romping to the barn, where we saw in a corral one thousand beautiful Angora goats, with fleeces of long, beautiful mohair hanging nearly to the ground, and as white as snow, bright and lustrous as silk. In one room of the barn were one hundred, shut up for a day's work for the men to shear. Oh, it was such fun to see the men catch them and wrestle them down on a platform, and shear the beautiful bright mohair which fell from them like huge snowflakes!

Grandpa was tying every one separately. He gave me some nice bunches, to make tassels for our scarfs, and I send you a specimen. I wish all the little children could see it, as it is the material from which all our mohair dress goods, braid, etc., are made.

LIZZIE FERGUSON.

[Thanks for the lovely specimen of Angora fleece. It is like silk, it is so soft and fine. Please giv our kind regards to "Grandpa" and "Grandma" Rogers, and best wishes for their future welfare.—ED. C. C.]

She Gave Up His Money.

A WOMAN'S QUICK WIT SAVES A FORTUNE BUT PUZZLES AN ANGRY MAN.

A woman's quick wit makes, when she has the courage to act upon it, a valuable aid in an emergency. Some years ago, in the days when "road agents" abounded in Montana, a woman was traveling by coach to join her husband. One day a fellow-passenger said to her:

"I hav $1,000 in my pocketbook, and feel uneasy about the road agents. Would you mind concealing it in your dress, and returning it to me at the end of your journey? If the highwaymen do stop us they are less liable to search you than me."

She acceded to his request, hid the money in her dress, and the stage drove on without meeting a road agent until toward evening. Then the shout, "Throw up your hands!" was heard. The driver promptly pulled up as four men on horseback, with masked faces, appeared in the road and covered him with their pistols.

Two of the highwaymen then rode to each side of the coach and ordered the passengers to giv up their arms, which they did promptly.

"Now shell out!" said the robbers.

The passengers handed out their pocketbooks; even the man who called in the woman's aid gave up a few dollars.

He was congratulating himself upon his caution, when he heard the woman say in a quiet way:

"I hav got $1,000, but I suppose I must giv it up."

Suiting the action to the word, she handed over the man's roll of greenbacks.

The robbers rode away, and then the man gave expression to his feelings by abusing the lady and accusing her of betraying his trust from sheer fright.

She smiled mysteriously.

"You will see, sir; but I can't explain now."

At the end of the journey she asked him to stay all night at her house, and said that her husband would be glad to see him.

"Yes, ma'am, I will come to your house," he answered in the tone of an injured man; "it's the least you can do, ma'am, seeing that you hav left me without a cent in the world."

At the lady's house he was treated as a distinguished guest, but neither host nor hostess offered him one word of explanation that night, and he went to bed a sad, irritated man.

The next morning as he entered the dining-room the host shook hands with him and said:

"Here is your $1,000, sir, which my wife ventured to borrow in an emergency. She had $20,000 which she was bringing to me concealed in her dress. She thought by giving up at once the $1,000 intrusted to her by you, she would save herself from being searched by the robbers.

"Her quick wit saved me from a heavy loss, and I am much obliged to you for the use of the forced loan."

Breakfast was a far more cheerful meal to the man than the supper of the night before. —Youth's Companion.

A Chinese Boy's Composition.

The difficulties which a foreigner meets with in learning the English language are well illustrated in the following composition on the whale, written by a San Francisco Chinese boy:

The whale livs in the sea and ocean of all the country. He is large and strong, plying among of kinds of all the fish and its length reach to 90 foot to 70 foots and its color almost is a dark; and he has a large head. When he swim in the up water he is so large as island, when struck in the water and angry he has so much voice as ring great deal thunder. If he danced make the storm without winds, and also when blow the water he almost lay down fog on the weather. His the form is proper to liv, for his front legs make higher and after legs is not there; the tails is high that open on the up waters. The mouth has no leaves on the head and a narrow beard like thorns. His body is a tough fish; he is not a fish, but a creature. His leaves his names whale-leaves. The men make the everything with it. Every years to seven or eight months, from four to five months, the whale man catch on sea or ocean. He many liv on the sea of the North Sea way or five island of Hirado, on Hingen country in Japan. The tell of the whale is move, but I do not know how to tell at all.

MOTHER (at tea-table): "Jack, who helped you to those three tarts?" Jack (aged seven): "The Lord." Mother: "The Lord? Why, what do you mean, Jack?" Jack: "Well, I helped myself; and father said yesterday the Lord helped those who helped themselvs."

BOY: "Pa! what did the preacher mean by saying 'Jesus after the flesh?'" Father: "Oh, that Jesus was going to the butcher's to fetch a joint, I suppose, for dinner." Boy: "And what did the preacher mean by saying 'Jesus after the spirit?' Was he gone to the pub to fetch a bottle of whisky?" Father: "No doubt."

SERVANT, to the parson, who is very ill indeed: "If you please, sir, the chorister is down-stairs and wants to know if you won't giv him the hymns for next Sunday's service?" Pastor, feebly: "Tell him there will be no service; I expect to be dead next Sunday." Servant, exit and reënter: "If you please, he says then will you be kind enough to send down the hymns you'd like sung at the funeral?" (Parson recovers much more rapidly than chorister.)

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

Religious Problems.

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

NOW IS THE TIME TO BE CURED. DO NOT PUT OFF TREATMENT.

Is a Staunch Friend and a Successful Physician.

The Better Way, of Cincinnati, O., says, "We are assured that Dr. Fellows, the eminent specialist of Vineland, N. J., is an educated gentleman of superior mind and large attainments, and that success in his profession has brought him business, not only from all parts of this country, but from foreign shores. He is in the prime of life and able to transact his various professional duties promptly and well and giv satisfaction in every instance. His references are numbered by thousands."

Lively Paragraphs from Our Liberal Contemporaries.

WAITING FOR THE GIRLS TO DO IT.

From the Better Way.

We heard a gentleman remark the other day that all this agitation on the liquor question would avail nothing. He had lived sixty-five years and seen nothing accomplished yet on the temperance question. There was no regulating the liquor traffic. We hav our spy-glass turned westward. We are waiting to see if the women can't regulate it. Don't lose hope, gentlemen.

THE BROOKLYN SIMIAN.

From Moses Hull's New Thought.

Rev. T. Dewitt Talmage never makes a fool of himself; the work was done for him before he got far enough along to hav much to say about it. Nobody ever knows, when he gets up to speak, what he is going to say nor how he is going to say it. If Dean Swift's rule of testing the monkey was a good one, the world would naturally classify him as a member of the genus simiadæ. Swift said, when he wanted amusement, he always preferred the performance of monkeys to men. He could generally tell what a man would do next by what he had done, while the actions of a monkey were a continual surprise to him.

THE SOCIETY TO TIP OVER THE THRONE.

From the London Radical for May.

The annual meeting of the Metropolitan Radical Federation, which takes place on the 3d inst., marks the completion of the third year of that body's existence. Seeing that it has as yet hardly emerged from the state of infancy, the record of the Metropolitan Radical Federation is a very creditable one. It would be idle to pretend that the somewhat sanguin hopes of its sponsors hav as yet been realized; but the foundation of a successful and powerful organization has been laid, and there is every reason to hope that, in the future, this truly democratic body will consolidate its position and advance to fresh victories.

THE ALLIANCE, O., FREETHINKERS.

From Bradlaugh's National Reformer.

W. Veness, formerly of Swindon, now settled in Ohio, U. S. A., writes: "We hav a church here (Alliance, O.) which is devoted to the gospel of Freethought. It is one of the finest halls in Alliance, and, as far as I can see at present, has one of the largest congregations. This church was presented to the party here, and endowed with sufficient to provide fuel and light, by a now deceased Atheist. Since we hav been here, the party has joined the American Secular Union. We are not yet enrolled as members of this body, but shall be so. We find that bigotry on religious matters is not so intense in this country as in England, but with respect to politics, it is much more so—that is, between employer and employee."

MINISTERIAL CONDUCT IS THE NAME FOR IT.

From Toronto Secular Thought.

Arsenes en arsesi—the suggestiv phrase of the apostle Paul (see Rom. i, 27)—is brought to mind almost at regular intervals by certain of the police reports of London, the accused being in every instance clergymen of the English church. The subject is one that we dare not specify or particularize; enough for us to say that, as Secularists, we are compelled to ask if there be any propensity or inclination to "do those things which are not convenient" (or, more literally "not proper") fostered by the early training of these men, and by the unguarded use of an unexpurgated Bible? We think it by no means unlikely, should these periodical revelations continue, that some alliterativ reporter will fall into the habit of characterizing this unnatural and unspeakable thing as "the Clerical Crime again."

A TENDENCY OF THE TIME.

From the Ironclad Age.

The God-in-the-Constitution amendment once adopted, and a state religion fixed upon us, the heathen would hav to take to the woods. What the heathen wants is for all people to hav religion that like it, and are willing to pay for it. The heathen does not want any religion for himself, and he does not like the idea of buying any for other people. He does not want to curtail any man's religious privileges, nor does he want to be taxed to support them. The heathen wants the laws so doctored up that he, as a citizen, without an ounce of religion, shall hav the same rights politically and legally that are conceded to the good man with a ton.

There is a growing suspicion that woman suffrage would result in a state religion, with its tests and its tithes. This suspicion will tend to carry the woman suffrage movement inside the church inclosures, and to circumscribe it to them.

TRY IT ON A PREACHER.

From Saladin's Secular Review.

A kind Christian brother writes us that we "should be burnt." We warn him that we are studious and lean, and would not burn well. If he really does want a good blaze, he should apply his match to some stout and lazy parson. We repeat we are lean, and when the very devil himself gets hold of us at last, and hurls us headlong into the blazes, he will not be able to say, "Now the fat's in the fire." Still, of course, we duly appreciate the Christian brother's charitable suggestion. Seeing, however, that he expects we are to hav such an exceedingly long spell of fire by and by, would it not hav been as well for him to hav said a kind word to us while we are here? This Christianity seems to put the rennet of hatred into the milk of human kindness and turn it into gall. We are only a benighted Agnostic; but our whole life would be one long night of misery if we believed that eternal torment was to be the lot of even the humblest sentient creature that ever crawled upon the face of the earth.

LONDON FREETHINKERS MUST FIGHT FOR THEIR RIGHTS.

From G. W. Foote's Freethinker.

Ugly rumors are afloat as to the police and our open-air meetings. It is said that a general attempt will be made to stop our outdoor propaganda. Should this turn out to be true, Freethinkers will hav to show fight. Without violence, rowdyism, or braggadocio, we must show that we are prepared to defend our rights. Unfortunately, however, it will be difficult to make a fight for some stations. At Camberwell Green, for instance, our meetings certainly block what is technically a thoroughfare, and not a very broad one either. Any magistrate would support the police in keeping the road clear. As a matter of fact, there is no actual obstruction, for there is no traffic; but the inhabitants of the neighboring houses are said to hav complained, and that would satisfy the bewigged gentleman on the bench. The outcry is, of course, purely fictitious; the police having got up the complaint themselvs. For years these open-air lectures hav been carried on, and no one has suffered. But for all that, if Warren's despotism will hav it so, the station must—at any rate for the present—be relinquished, and our battles must be fought over more convenient spots, such as the parks and broad, open spaces.

But one principle must be maintained in every case. If the spot is unsuitable, all meetings should be prohibited. If any are allowed, Freethinkers will insist on equality with others.

A CHALLENGE IN TWO COUNTS.

From Lucifer.

The "unco guid" of Valley Falls, and the Western agents of the New York Vice Society, are trying to "suppress" Lucifer and its publishers on the charge of obscenity. The exchanges quoted by the church organ of this place call Lucifer the "vile sheet," "that journalistic compost-heap," etc.

Now, to test this matter by a little legitimate comparison we make this offer: Let the editor of the New Era, or the ministers, elders, and deacons of Valley Falls, select a dozen sentences or paragraphs from the columns of Lucifer. We will select a dozen verses from their text-book, the Bible. Let these be printed, side by side, on the same sheet, for comparison, and let these leaflets be given, one each, to every reader of the New Era. Half the expense to be borne by the New Era and its friends and half by us. Or let them be sold to all who may wish to compare Lucifer with the Bible, at one cent each.

This is offer No. 1. We also renew the offer made to Mr. Robinson's predecessor, viz.: We will giv the editor of the New Era $10 if he will print ten verses from the Bible—our selection—in his paper, and send them to all his subscribers. This will be $1 per verse. By so doing Mr. Robinson will be advertising, at our expense, the "word of God," the "book of books," the "holy Bible"—and if holy, then, of course, there can be nothing unholy, unclean, or obscene within its pages.

THE AWFUL HUNGER OF CULTURE.

From the Banner of Light.

"The world is incredulous," says the Boston Advertiser, "not because it is unwilling to believe, but because it is unable to believe. The claims are self-contradictory." And then it buttons its coat across its breast, and takes down its shining tile from the peg with thoughts intent on dining. And in this way it supposes it has extinguished Spiritualism. Kindly ask it what it would hav in order to satisfy its exacting wants, and it pompously answers that it will hav some more "Paradise Lost" from John Milton, something real nice from Julius Cæsar, and Napoleon Bonaparte, and George Washington, and good stiff oratory from Demosthenes and Wendell Phillips. It cries out in its paroxysm of intellectual hunger for "profound thought," "brilliant epigram," "poetic imagery," "character creation," and "additions to the world's stock of useful knowledge" In short, like the child, it wants the moon. Then dropping into the patronizing habit, it admits its willingness to believe that all mediums are not consciously fraudulent. Thanks for nothing. It is even willing to allow that "not a few eminent scholars" think that "some hitherto undiscovered natural forces exist, and cause a portion of the strange things which undoubtedly do really happen in connection with those who claim mediumistic powers." Then these phenomena are "strange things," are they? Aha! But how much longer would the world hav had to wait for them if it had depended on these "eminent scholars" to bring them about? Here is where the bottom falls entirely out of the Advertiser's tub, and we suggest that it suspend publication until it has attended to its coopering.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN TWO FAMOUS ANARCHISTS.

B. R. Tucker, in Liberty.

But, after all, it makes verv little difference to Herr Most what a man believes in economics. The test of fellowship with him lies in acceptance of dynamite as a cure-all. Though I should prove that my economic views, if realized, would turn our social system inside out, he would not therefore regard me as a revolutionist. He declares outright that I am no revolutionist, because the thought of the coming revolution (by dynamite, he means) makes my flesh creep. Well, I frankly confess that I take no pleasure in the thought of bloodshed and mutilation and death. At these things my feelings revolt. And if delight in them is a requisit of a revolutionist, then indeed I am no revolutionist. When revolutionist and cannibal become synonyms, count me out, if you please. But, though my feelings revolt, I am not mastered by them or made a coward by them. More than from dynamite and blood do I shrink from the thought of a permanent system of society involving the slow starvation of the most industrious and deserving of its members. If I should ever become convinced that the policy of bloodshed is necessary to end our social system, the loudest of to-day's shriekers for blood would not surpass me in the stoicism with which I would face the inevitable. Indeed, a plumb-liner to the last, I am confident that under such circumstances many who now think me chicken-hearted would condemn the stony-heartedness with which I should favor the utter sacrifice of every feeling of pity to the necessities of the terroristic policy.

MR. SEAVER VANQUISHES A CHRISTIAN.

From the Boston Investigator.

A skeptic and a believer were discussing the uselessness of faith without works, and the following were some of their arguments:

Skeptic: "The Bible is on my side here. It says that 'faith without works is dead, being alone.' Here you perceive faith alone is useless—dead."

Believer: "I admit that; but here faith and works are coupled—the one givs effect to the other."

Skeptic: "But can you show me a passage which says that good works without faith are dead—being alone? Not one; good works are never dead or useless—a good act done by an unbeliever is just as effectual as one done by a believer—a dollar given by an unbeliever to a starving family will buy as much bread as the dollar of a believer will."

Believer: "That is sound reasoning, and I cannot controvert it; the difference must only lie in the motivs which induced each to giv the dollar."

Skeptic: "Suppose that the believer gave his dollar for the glory of God, and the unbeliever his from dictates of humanity, which is most entitled to credit?"

Believer: "I think he who gave it for the glory of God."

Skeptic: "There I differ from you, because he who gave it for the glory of God did an act from an ideal motiv, unless he expected that God would giv him credit, or reward him either here or hereafter, for this act, and this I consider the real motiv; whereas the unbeliever expected no credit or reward from God; all the reward he could expect was the gratitude of those his bounty relieved, and the approbation of his own conscience, in performing an act of kindness to his fellowbeings."

Believer: "I cannot refute that reasoning, and here I must leave you for the present."

JOSEPH SYMES'S LABOR IN AUSTRALIA.

From the Melbourne Liberator.

Mr. Symes has been in Melbourne over four years. He landed on the 10th February, 1884. Nearly the whole of the time he has not only been incessant in his work of lecturing, journalism, science classes, etc., but he has had a world of fighting also. He has been no fewer than ten times before magistrates and judges of the supreme court. And in spite of the most dastardly action of the government, he has managed to keep the Liberator going and to keep the Hall of Science open. Nor is that all. The Liberator to-day is as efficient as ever, is more respected than ever, is a far greater power than ever; and this too in spite of the commercial depression in Sydney and Adelaide, and in spite of the cowardly attempts of pretended Freethinkers to boycott and damage us. The Liberator has earned its title to be considered the Freethought journal of Australasia, the republican paper of the colonies. And what it has been in the past it will continue to be so long as Mr. Symes is at its head. And the Hall of Science—who shall describe it? There you find the same enthusiasm as greeted our editor four years ago—more, if possible—the same hearty mutual respect between audience and lecturer. And those are the most astonishing phenomena in Melbourne life. One man, with not one single learned friend to converse with, the butt of newspaper malice, of pulpit bile, of government spleen and hypocrisy, with nothing but his own ability and honesty of purpose and design to carry him through, carries on a hall and a paper in spite of all the rascaldom of Victoria! And he does this for four years upon the stretch; and shows no signs of flagging or weariness. Verily, the Secularists never had greater cause to rally round their leader; nor was there ever a time when it was more necessary to unite in solid phalanx to resist their foes. The fight is far from being over.

A CONVERTED JEW IN TEXAS.

From J. D. Shaw's Independent Pulpit.

Some time ago there appeared in our city papers a spread-eagle sort of advertisment, prefaced as follows: "Oriental Lectures—Dr. Wad-El-Ward in Waco—High Commendation from our Pastors," and signed by the pastor of the First Baptist church, the pastor of the Methodist church, and the pastors of two Presbyterian churches. In the advertisment referred to, these gentlemen recommended to the confidence and favor of their various flocks, and of the people of Waco, a gentleman by the name of Wad-El-Ward as a Hebrew Christian, the son of a Jerusalem rabbi, lineally descended from Judas Maccabeus. They vouched for him as an accomplished and fluent linguist, speaking thirteen languages, including Hebrew, Arabic, Greek, Latin, German, French, and English, and as an honorary member of the alumni of Harvard University. The Baptist church was tendered him, and tickets sold readily at fifty cents admission.

The show came off—a real humbug it proved to be, too, made up of a little preaching, a little lecturing, in poor, broken English, enlivened with some heathen toggery, bad music, and poor dancing. It is said that Dr. Burleson and his college students were on hand, and seemed to enjoy it immensely. The great "convert" was all the talk until the people began to comprehend his little scheme for avoiding the Opera House rent and taxes. It transpires now that there is no such rabbi in Jerusalem as he claims to be the son of, that he was never an honorary member of the alumni of Harvard University, and that he is a very poor Hebrew scholar.

THE "WHISPERERS?"

From San Francisco Freethought.

The twelfth annual Congress of the American Secular Union will be held at Pittsburgh, Pa., in October. Considering the subject, the Pittsburgh Truth says:

In Freethought, a new Liberal paper, of which President Putnam is one of the editors, there appeared on March 24th a significant editorial in reference to the American Secular Union and what ought to be done at the next Congress. "There is no question," says the editor, "that the great body of Liberals throughout these States desire a union of some kind through which they can, as it were, touch hands, and which will bring them together in national fraternity."

We firmly believe the prominent and influential Liberals of this country would heartily support such a union. But why is it that the American Secular Union does not receive a hearty support from the great body of Liberals, of every shade of opinion? That it does not, no one will deny.

The question, "Why is it that the American Secular Union does not receive a hearty support from the great body of Liberals of every shade of opinion?" is one that is easily answered. It was answered substantially in the article from which Truth quotes. The Union is not heartily supported because it has so many supposed-to-be friends who are in fact its enemies. By these persons every device for injuring the organization is resorted to. The public and private character of its officers is attacked in open charges and by innuendo. There are promulgators of confidential circulars. There are schemers and plotters and whisperers who by underhanded methods reach the working Liberals of the country and instil into their minds the poison of suspicion and distrust. These schemers and whisperers cannot be reformed; the nature of them cannot be changed; their malady is chronic or constitutional. If they cannot be induced to make their attacks openly, or to put themselvs in a position to be attacked, the only hope for the Secular Union is that they may pay the debt of nature soon and their deeds die with them. No one can wish for the prolongation of the lives of men who liv only for the injury they can do to others. It is because such men exist, and make the Secular Union the object of their malignity, that the organization does not receive the full confidence of the great body of Liberals, which it deserves, and is not generously supported by them.

We second the motion of Truth that the other Liberal papers take a stand in the matter, but we cannot agree that the Union needs fixing up by the Pittsburgh Congress or any other. The Union has a platform—the Nine Demands of Liberalism—that needs no tinkering. Its methods are the most effectiv that can be carried out with small means, and its executiv officers are among the best men in the ranks.

The Congress may possibly find means for furthering the work and giving the Union a new impetus. That will be its chief object. It promises to be a lively gathering, and it is hoped that the whisperers or their representativs will there find the lungs to express themselvs in a voice audible to the public ear.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

THE LORD'S IDEA OF STYLE.

And for Aaron's sons thou shalt make coats, and thou shalt make for them girdles, and bonnets shalt thou make for them, for glory and for beauty. And thou shalt make them linen breeches to cover their nakedness; from the loins even unto the thighs they shall reach.—Ex. xxviii, 40, 42.

Odds and Ends.

THIS is the time when the wary citizen reads the "Country Board" advertisments in order to decide where not to go.

IN Volapuk "galon" means to rejoice. That is what a young man does when he has a gal-on his knee. Volapuk is no slouch of a language, after all.

THE latest bit of political gossip is to the effect that Belva Lockwood has given up wearing the prevailing style of tournure. If elected president, she proposes to take her seat.

THE California vulture is known as Pseudoscryphus Californianus. We always thought the California vulture the man who has building lots for sale in Los Angeles and thereabouts.

"THE cow that givs condensed milk—I suppose you hav one on the place, Farmer Robinson?" inquired his fair city visitor. "Well, no. Ye see, I sold her last year because she would put her foot in the can."

BEFORE taking: "Oh, dear me, George, don't! I think you are just awful!" After taking: "The mean, horrid thing! Did anybody ever see such a stupid?" N B.—The only thing that poor George took was his departure.

MR. GOTHAM: "Would you like to see 'Pygmalion' to-night, Miss Porcine?" Miss Porcine (of Cincinnati): "Yes, very much, Mr. Gotham. I believe in encouraging anything connected with the great hog industry."

A PASTOR of a North Carolina church, having graduated from the army to the ministry, recently startled his congregation by announcing the collection with the unusual command: "Attention, company! Present alms!"

"THAT is a dangerous-looking dog you hav there, deacon. Aren't you afraid he will injure somebody?" "Well, yes," replied the deacon, uneasily. "I havn't much confidence in the animal. If you hear of anybody who wants a good dog, let me know, and I'll sell him cheap."

"MY dear," said a sick husband, as he lay with his eyes closed, "I think my time has come at last. I can hear strains of the sweetest music that ever mortal ear——" "That's a little German band on the street, John." "That's so," he said, rousing himself. "Tell 'em to move on!"

AT a prayer-meeting in a Western town the pastor urged the people to ask any question that they would like to hav answered. This prompted an old fellow to get up and remark: "What I want to know is, ef an oath taken on a Bible which hez the fust ten chapters of Gennysis kissed off'n it, is binding."

"WHAT a triumph for justice!" she exclaimed. "You, of course, hav heard of the annex girl who was awarded a prize for a historical essay over a number of Harvard students?" "Oh, yes," he said, "I've heard of it." "Well!" she went on proudly, "do you know that the papers are all talking about it?" And then the brute said calmly, "The papers wouldn't be all talking about it, you know, if it weren't such an unprecedented thing, and almost certain never to happen again."

"JOHN," said the minister to the sexton, "that pulpit cushion is worn out. I wish you would see that a new cover is put on it." "Yes, sir," said John, grimly; "I know it's wore out, an' it's the third this year. It ain't my place to make remarks, sir, but in my opinion there is such a thing as carryin' religion a leetle too far."

DOMINIE (to choir leader): "The collection this morning, Mr. Hotwater, was very small, and I am sorry to say that I think the meagerness was largely due to you." Choir leader: "Largely due to me, sir?" Dominie: "Yes. Hereafter, while the plate is being passed, I wish you would try to make a better selection of music than 'Salvation's Free.'"

"YOUNG man," he asked, solemnly, "do you giv heed to things of a religious nature?" "Well, yes, sir," responded the young man. "Last Sunday, for instance, I caught a glance from a pair of soft brown eyes that were on their way to church, to which I gave considerable heed. There are times, sir, when things of a religious nature are restful and consoling."

DE LARA: "Were you shaking hands with that slugger, wife-beater, and generally bad man, the 'Jersey Bantam?'" De Sniffles: "Why, yes. Wales did it for Mr. Sullivan, and it's quite the thing, don't yer know? The chappies are getting up a reception for John L. You will want some tickets, of course. Five dollars buys one." De Lara: "You may giv me four. And say! Present me to the 'Bantam,' will you?"

SMITHSON: "I saw you at the theater last evening, I believe, Miss Bacon. Did the performance come up to your expectation?" Miss Bacon (who is a member of the Cheyenne Culture Club): "I can hardly say I was wholly satisfied, Mr. Smithson. Why, that hero fatigued me every time he pulled his gun. The slowest cow-puncher on our ranch would pump him full of lead before he could get his hands away from his hip!"

WIFE: "What do you mean by coming home at this time of night, George?" Husband: "'S all your fault, my dear—hic's—all your fault." W. (with a dark frown): "All my fault, sir? All my fault?" H.: "Yes. F'lers wanted me to stay longer. Wouldn't do it. Said a man with a wife's pretty 'n amiable's mine had no s'cuse for staying out any longer. That's reason why—er—I come home so soon." W. (smiling): "Well, you're a great trial to me, George, but I suppose I'll hav to forgiv you."

"PA," said he the other day, "do angels hav wings?" "Yes, son." "Pa, if I'm a good boy, will I be an angel?" "Yes, son." "An' hav wings an' fly away up an' up an' out of sight?" "Yes; if you want to, I suppose you can, son." (After a long pause.) "Say, pa." "Well, what is it, son?" "If you see me flying with wings when you's out hunting, you wouldn't shoot me, would you, pa?" "No; papa wouldn't shoot his little boy." A long pause and then: "Pa, do angels hav feathers on 'em?" "Y-e-s [groping with some hesitation in the dusty theological corner of a world worn brain], I suppose so, son." (Another pause.) "Pa, can you pick an angel?" The fond parent here took refuge in laughter, and the sitting ended in the banishment of the young knowledge-seeker to his little bed.

Gems of Thought.

WHEN women reason, and babes sit in the lap of philosophy, the victory of reason over the shadowy hosts of darkness will be complete.—Ingersoll.

THERE are who converse with one sort of men; they read but one sort of books; they will not come in the hearing but of one sort of notions. The truth is, they canton out to themselvs a little Goshen in the intellectual world, where light shines, and, as they conclude, day blesses them; but the rest of that vast expansure they giv up to night and darkness, and so avoid coming near it.—John Locke.

WHILE the Bible contains many valuable precepts and much that man could heed with profit, the good is so intermixed with chaff and rubbish, with so much that does violence to our reason and common sense, that it is not possible that the whole could hav emanated from a being to whom we ascribe divine perfection.—Dr. Arter.

O REMEMBER that my life is wind: mine eye shall no more see good. The eye of him that hath seen me shall see me no more: thine eyes are upon me and I am not. As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more. He shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more.—Job vii, 7-10.

WHAT shall we say of a religion that consigns to hell a Humboldt and Comte, a Paine and Jefferson, a Huxley and Spencer, a Parker and Emerson, a Lydia Maria Child and Harriet Martineau, and promises eternal joy to every robber and assassin, provided they "trust in Jesus" in their dying hour? Is it not true that the Bible contains good and bad principles, and, like all other books, should be read with discrimination?—B. F. Underwood.

SUCH members of Parliament as condescend to deal in theological questions hav very much the opinions of ordinary cultivated Englishmen; they are much too respectable to say anything shocking to their clergy or to their wives, but if they are not saturated to the core with the opinions which clergymen denounce as Atheism, my experience must be of a most exceptional nature.—Leslie Stephen.

IT is a little singular that the more the Bible is revised, and studied, and discussed, the less people believe of it, and the less influence it seems to exert over their lives. The vast majority of professing Christians hav no knowledge of Greek or Hebrew, and must, therefore, form their estimate of the accuracy of different renderings by the opinions of disputing divines. Tens of thousands of sincere Christians are almost illiterate in their mother tongues, and cannot understand why there should be need for so much revision of the book that their mothers taught them to regard as inspired from cover to cover. They know that this is a good book, by which they hav tried to liv and desire to die, but if it is true, why should learned clergymen change its wording?—Toronto Evening News.

THE early Christians felt more and did more than those of the present day, not because they were better men, but because they believed more; and they believed more because they knew less. Doubt is the offspring of knowledge: the savage never doubts at all.—Winwood Reade.

YOU take wheat to cast into the earth's bosom: your wheat may be mixed with chaff, chopped straw, barn-sweepings, dust, and all imaginable rubbish; no matter; you cast it into the kind, just earth; she grows the wheat—the whole rubbish she silently absorbs, shrouds it in, says nothing of the rubbish. The yellow wheat is growing then; the good earth is silent about all the rest, has silently turned all the rest to some benefit, too, and makes no complaint about it! So everywhere in Nature! She is true, and not a lie; and yet so great, and just, and motherly in her truth! She requires of a thing only that it be genuin of heart; she will protect it if so; will not if not so. There is a soul of truth in all the things she ever gave harbor to.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

IF instead of the "glad tidings" that there exists a being in whom all the excellences which the highest human mind can conceive exist in a degree inconceivable to us, I am informed that the world is ruled by a being whose attributes are infinit, but what they are we cannot learn, nor what are the principles of his government, except that "the highest human morality which we are capable of conceiving" does not sanction them, convince me of it, and I will bear my fate as I may. But when I am told that I must believe this, and at the same time call this being by the names which express and affirm the highest human morality, I say, in plain terms, that I will not. Whatever power such a being may hav over me, there is one thing which he shall not do—he shall not compel me to worship him. I will call no being good who is not what I mean when I apply that epithet to my fellow-creatures; and if such a being can sentence me to hell for not so calling him, to hell [gehenna!] I will go.—J. S. Mill.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 15. No. 22. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, June 2, 1888. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

(Tammany Ward Worker to Methodist Ministerial Delegate:) "SHAKE! OLD MAN; WE'RE ON THE SAME LAY."

Notes and Clippings.

SAN FRANCISCO is to hav a crematory. A company has been formed, which owns a valuable lot, and next month work will be begun upon the furnace and chapel.

CATHOLICS claim the proportion of their population in this country to hav increased as follows: 1770, 1-120; 1790, 1-70; 1800, 1-53; 1810, 1-48; 1830, 1-21; 1850, 2-7; 1888, 1-6.

THE statue of the Virgin to be erected on the mountains beside Montreal will hav a pedestal 200 feet high; it will be hollow, an elevator carrying the public to the head at a 5-cent fare.

A CORRESPONDENT of Hodder and Stoughton's religious British Weekly made recently the statement that the Young Men's Christian Association has been at work in London for forty-four years, has about sixty metropolitan and suburban branches, and yet all its members and associations could be comfortably seated in two London theaters.

THE death is announced of a notable member of the Parisian demi-monde—to wit, the Madam Adele Bardin, more generally known as Baroness d'Ange. Her trim voiture, drawn by a pair of fine steeds of raven blackness, was for many years a well-known feature of the boulevards and the Champs Elysees. She expired in a convent, whither she was taken at her own request.

THE Episcopal mission in Mexico still seems to be in a sadly muddled condition. Several rival agencies are appealing for funds, and no one appears to know which of them is the authorized representativ of the church. A large number of intelligent laymen of the church hav no faith whatever in the mission, and would like to hav it withdrawn. The intelligent laymen should hav their likes gratified.

THE religious statistics contained in latest census returns of India inform us that there are over 40,000,000 Mohammedans and 3 Unitarians in that country. Though the Unitarians can hardly be called an important and influential sect in India, says the Sun, they certainly occupy a very conspicuous position among 250,000,000 people. From a statistical point of view the Unitarians of India appear to be Trinitarians.

EMANCIPATION is progressing rapidly in some parts of Brazil. In the province of San Paulo the slaves are being set free at the rate of five hundred and six hundred a day, and the legislature has passed a bill forbidding the use of the prisons for the custody of runaway slaves. Thousands of runaway slaves hav returned to work on being assured that they would be paid wages and not deprived of their liberty. Important liberations are taking place in other provinces, but are less numerous than those of San Paulo.

HERE'S a how-de-do! The Interior, of Chicago, declares unreservedly that "Andover is the greatest old squirt of a theological seminary in the world." We should like to see some secular paper with the sacrilegious gall necessary to make such an announcement. And then we should like to observe which dissecting-room of a medical college would enjoy the pleasure of his remains. There is a great field for the clergy which regularly declaims against the iniquity of the ordinary Sunday newspaper to cultivate Christian resignation and religious calm for the especial use of the authorized organs of the church.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

MR. BRADLAUGH moved the following resolution in the House of Commons on the 1st ult.: "That in the opinion of this House, ownership of land should carry with it the duty of cultivation or utilization, and that in all cases where land capable of cultivation or utilization with profit, and not devoted to some purpose of public utility or enjoyment, is held in a vacant, waste, or uncultivated state, the local authorities ought to hav the power to compulsorily acquire such land by payment to the owner of a sum representing the capital agricultural value of such lands, in order that such local authorities may, in their discretion, let the said land to tenant cultivators, with such conditions as to term of tenancy, rent, reclamation, drainage, utilization, and cultivation respectivly as shall afford reasonable encouragement, opportunities, facilities, and security for the due utilization, cultivation, and development of the said lands."

THE Mercury says: "The Methodist Conference had a lively time of it in electing the five new bishops, and Parson Newman, ex-court chaplain of the Grant régime, had a chance to get in some fine electioneering work. It was a singular canvass all through. At the start nobody had an idea that Dr. Newman had a ghost of a show, and everybody was certain that Dr. James M. King, of this city, would be the first man chosen to the episcopate. But the first day's balloting showed a 'combine,' and the unsuspicious portion of the delegates were roped in by a special lobby of politicians from Washington before they knew it. It was a funny result. Dr. King was defeated, it is said, because John D. Slayback, and other wealthy brokers, were supporting him, and Dr. Newman was elected, it is certain, through the hard work of his political friends in the foyer of the Opera House. However, if the brethren are satisfied so are we—only let us hear no more in the religious press about the wickedness of political nominating conventions."

THE Australian government allows few Chinese in its realm. The excluding bill, passed recently, operates from the first of May. It indemnifies the government for past acts; prohibits the naturalization of Chinamen; allows vessels to bring one Chinaman to every 300 tons (instead of one to 100 tons as heretofore); raises the poll tax from £10 to £100, and fixes the penalty for an evasion of the law at from £10 to £50. Chinamen will be permitted to trade in defined areas, but the number in each of these districts must not exceed five. The bill also imposes restrictions as to residence and trading. Traveling Chinese with passports will not be allowed to engage in mining operations, except by permission of the government. The bill does not affect Chinese who are British subjects. All Chinese must report themselvs and take out an annual license, which shall cost ten shillings, and the governor in council is empowered to make regulations relativ thereto. All Chinese will be preserved in their civil rights. The police hav received strict orders to prevent any molestation of the Chinese.

SAYS the Herald: "The daily publication of a verse of holy scripture by Colonel Shepard's Mail and Express is beginning to bear good fruit; some of our esteemed contemporaries are already reprinting the quotations as original matter, crediting them to Colonel Shepard's paper. This reminds us of the prominent American editor (name not essential) who, one Sunday night, strayed into a church, all the other places being shut up, heard the preacher read the story of Israel's escape from Egypt, hurried back to the office, had the narrativ put in type, and issued an edition which was bulletined as, 'Extra! Great Naval Engagement on the Red Sea!'"

FROM the Standard: "John Most was announced to lecture on Anarchy in Odd Fellows' hall at New Haven last week, but when he arrived the owners of the hall locked him and his audience out. This conduct of the hall-owners will no doubt receive the approval of public sentiment generally, as it did that of the public sentiment of New Haven; nevertheless, repression in cases like this is by no means the better policy. When an obnoxious priest of the Church of England, named Johnson, had been sentenced, in the time of James the Second, to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn, and a Catholic priest pleaded for the victim with James, the king's final reply was: 'Mr. Johnson has the spirit of a martyr and it is fit that he should be one!' A few years later William the Third said of a Jacobite: 'He has set his heart on being a martyr, and I hav set mine on disappointing him!' From these two incidents which Macaulay narrates that historian draws a moral which it would be well to consider with reference to cases like that of Most. 'These two speeches,' said Macaulay, 'would alone suffice to explain the widely different fates of the two princes.'"

A Tribute to Religion.

Religion, thou art a metamorphosed maniac-dream, whose horrid face, and bloody hands with drawn sword, hav crossed the chosen Eden of every human being since the time that nature's maw grew sick of thee and spewed thee out. Vile, polluted monster, whose touch and putrid breath hav poisoned every man, woman, and child since the dawn of human life! Humanity's great heart has ever been laboring to attain a destiny commensurate with what it is; but it has ever been checkmated by your foul presence. And long centuries hav gone by while this great heart, bleeding, sorrowful, tearful, and sad, has been forced to pay thee homage in bloody rites, and in slaughtered self-respect, mourning over innocence lost, which all who serve thee feel. Thou infamous deceiver, whose very breath pollution is, thou hast entered the home of innocence and with thy name hast sown the seeds of strife and death! The bloody wars of all history are thine. Prisons, dungeons, and inquisitorial fires and hells are full of thee. Thou hast blistered with the touch of thy bloodstained fingers the cheek of childhood by thy cursed rites, and thy baptismal waters and consecrated bloody wafers which are the symbols of thy reign mean the loss of all that is noble and potential in thy bound victims. Thou vile traducer and robber, thou dost traduce this human nature, and our babes are cursed by thee as soon as born! Thou pronouncest them depraved. Thou sly, insinuating serpent, with what a hideous hiss dost thou accuse the mother, as she rocks the cradle of innocence where smiles a tribute to her pain and sorrow, with being unclean without thy criminal rites because she is a mother! Thy pilfering fingers dally with innocence until that innocence is stolen away by the wily play of hidden deceit. And thus it is that childhood's consecration to thee is a pledge of crippled manhood and womanhood. Once within thine iron grasp, it is hard to gain self-respect on the ground of non-pandering virtues, for thou, wretched thief, dost rob them of reason, self-respect, and the right to think, and thus extinguish every hope which comes to clear the journey of life. And thou, with malicious, black intent, will show thy hideous form as the poor, weary pilgrim stands upon the bank of the river whose waters mean death forever or a peaceful passage across, flashing in his face the fiery tortures of eternal misery, a devil and an angry God, unless the poor, weary pilgrim will still wash and kiss the bloody hands of this vile offspring of nature's filthy offal. Thou ever art the ceaseless, relentless foe of man. Thou hast driven thousands to suicide and the insane asylum. Thou hast frightened into painful torture millions of the sick and dying. Hundreds of millions hav gone to the slaughter at thy bidding. Other hundreds of millions hav gone on bended knees with weeping eyes, and the sobbing cry of distress was heard as these poor, powerless wretches were driven by thee to fulfill thy dreadful decree of penance, in long and weary pilgrimages, maiming, and all painful, horrid, murderous rites. More than the curse of Cain, and all the told and untold crimes of drunkenness, a thousand times more, are thy crimes.

But the cup of human torture which thou hast quaffed has not satisfied thy rapacious thirst for still wider desolation, for thou art even now seeking by thy cunning treachery and immeasurable deep depravity to insinuate thyself into decent society. Thou brutal murderer of all human hopes, how thou art striving to find a footing within the domain of science! Dost thou imagin that thou art needed here, with thy record of infamy which has cursed every revelation of science, defiling with thy dirty fingers every moral principle which has felt thy pestilential breath? Science to back thee up and giv thee recognition! The ghosts of all the dead, if such there be, who ever had a scientific thought while here on earth, defend us from this unholy, unreasonable association! Science and religion —O ye gods, what a proposition! When two and two cease to be four; when emptiness is fulness; when to be and not to be, at the same time, is possible; when all the parts of a thing are less than the whole; when all the Christian bankers and cashiers become honest men; when prayer is answered and God is revealed, until then, and not before, can Science afford to take such a monster to its breast. Until then there is not, nor can there be, any support rendered religion by science. Its drooling, slimy utterances make the distance between it and science immeasurable. Adieu, thou vile stench! Murder is in thy every gesture, and side by side dost thou stand with the murderer doing his awful deed of sin, and thou dost encourage him in his foul deed by a promis of forgivness, and when to the gallows he is led thou art still by his side with thy promises and sacred rites to assure him that, as soon as the hanging is done, he goes to heaven to sing the praises of redeeming love, while his victims are in hell. Venomous reptil, how dost thou gloat over the work of horrid deeds, with "forgivness" in thy bony, putrid hands! Adieu, thou deadly cu[illegible] of all the centuries!

The Gospel According to Common Sense.

PRIMITIV CHRISTIANITY.

Whether or not Jesus Christ, or, in plain English, Jesus the Anointed, was a real historical character or altogether a myth, is not so certain as that about the time of his supposed advent a great many persons were "anointed," or, as we should say in modern slang, "tarred," with the same brush. The disciples were first called Christians, i. e., anointed ones, at Antioch, evidently as a term of derision. The modern Christian, not knowing the literal meaning of the Greek word, complacently adopts the nickname as a title of honor and distinction. Bruce tells us that the Abyssinian dandy, when he wanted to shine in the eyes of his countrymen and countrywomen, placed a big lump of butter on his head, from whence, being melted by the heat of the sun, it soon flowed over his naked body. The "precious ointment" in a similar manner "ran down on Aaron's beard, even unto the skirts of his raiment" (Ps. cxxxiii, 2). Such a plentiful use of grease seems filthy and objectionable to modern apprehension, but it is evident that before the invention of soap, grease or oil was used as a detergent in all well-regulated households. Guests of distinction were, in Homer's time, lubricated with oil after the preliminary bath. To the Pharisaic host who complained of the waste of ointment used in anointing his feet, Jesus retorted, "My head with oil thou didst not anoint." He was not a guest of distinction, and, except in that solitary case, does not appear to hav been anointed at all. From the context it appears that the woman who administered it was a prostitute, and had probably received the box of ointment as the price of her favors!

Since the invention of Pears's Soap, so highly recommended as a beautifier of the skin, Christianity in its primitiv sense has become obsolete. The Roman Catholics, perhaps, still practice "extreme unction;" and the "peculiar people," when one of their number is sick, instead of sending for a doctor, "pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord" (James v, 14). But these are exceptional cases. The anointing in most cases is entirely figurativ. We still find abundant specimens of the "round, fat, oily man of God" in our Methodist churches, but since it has become the fashion to wear the hair short, Rowland's Macassar is never heard of. Calvinistic oil of vitriol is considered too strong for use either internally or externally; and petroleum, suggestiv of universal conflagration, has exploded by spontaneous combustion. And yet unbelievers liv, and laugh at the silly fears they imbibed with their pap!

Enough has been said respecting the etymological meaning of Christianity, and what the "anointed" ones did is a matter of history. We do not find that they did any very great things for two or three centuries, at least. At first they appear to hav practiced Communism, and had a strong objection to half-measures on the part of their converts. The story of Ananias and Sapphira is a case in point. Nothing more diabolical than the evident murder of those two persons is recorded even of Moses. Yet it is construed into an act of that benevolent God who gave his only begotten son for the salvation of sinners! Peter was a coarse, ignorant, brutal savage, who could curse, swear, and tell lies with anybody when it suited his purpose to do so. Yet the church of Rome claims him for her patron saint and founder; and well has she carried out his instructions, supposing them to hav been on a level with his example. But Communistic Christianity was not found to be practicable even then. The Apostle Paul, a man of culture, endowed with a keen intellect and a humane disposition, became infected with the prevailing epidemic. Perhaps it was less objectionable than the strict Judaism to which he had been brought up. At any rate, he made it do. A man's religion is always more or less modified by his character. A good man will make a good Christian, but Christianity will never convert a bad man into a good one. Paul saw at once the fallacy of the Communistic theory, and ordained that if a disciple would not work neither should he eat. He set the best of examples by paying rent for the house he lived in, and working at his trade to supply his necessities. In order that his wants might be few, he remained a bachelor, but did not forbid other men to marry if they felt so inclined. His epistles, on which the creed of Christendom is supposed to be founded, were never understood by those who drew up the creed. They pass the comprehension of any man who is not intellectually on a level with the writer. They for the most part relate to his individual experience alone, and like Samson's riddle are caviare to everyone who has not plowed with the same heifer. He may hav met with sympathetic spirits at the time, but it was Peter, and not Paul, who founded a church suited to the vulgar comprehension, of which representativs are to be found in the present day. The modern church owes its existence to imposture, and has not scrupled to maintain it by bloodshed.

OUTIS.

A Grumble From the Pews.

I sit in church and hear things said in sermons which make me boil with anger and shamed out of my self-respect, they are so insulting; and said, too, at me, in a place where there is no opportunity given to answer; and said in a galling tone of, "Behold! I am the Lord." And if my views happen to be known, too, why, then I can fancy my fellow-listeners saying, "That settles —— and his Infidel notions; glad the parson sat down on all such Liberal stuff; guess that is pretty conclusiv on Darwin, Huxley, and all such Infidels."

So, as the talk in church, as well as in all religious papers, is all on one side, I guess I'll hav to let off a little steam in some such paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER, for instance, or I shall burst.

In these days the world, or at least a part of it—the best part of it—may be allowed to hav learned the lesson of toleration. Not but what there are plenty of murky souls hankering for the fires of Smithfield even now, but they will hav to wait till doomsday, patiently. But the lesson of truth seeking, as a dominant principle, is still but half conned.

Yet it is coming into fashion, there is the mischief of it; people are talking inconveniently much about it; yes, and they are probing and prying, and it is getting to be the style now to "keep the mind open to conviction"—even to the conviction that there are spooks, if good evidence can be brought. There is getting to be an inconveniently large number from whom even their years of early training in the catechism and in church-going, so powerful to bias the views through life, are unable to exclude the fatal question, What is the truth?

Now we know that the only way to get at the truth is by discussion; and we know that the modern mind is getting quite exacting, and that that theory or system which avoids the light which would be thrown on it by allowing a free discussion of its right to be is apt to lose influence in these modern days. Discussion, too, involves freedom to speak not only for but against; and a permit of safe-conduct to and from the diet, as it were; by which I mean that the accuser, contradicter, or opposer shall go scatheless and secure from fear, though, in the exercise of his parliamentary rights, he may say things that are even very offensiv to the ear of the advocates of the system. This is not merely to say that he will not be put to death, or hav his property or civil rights taken from him, but that he must not be made to suffer in any way, must be courteously treated, and be under no ban of any kind.

Hinder, scare, boycott, or affix any sort of stigma under any guise upon one side of a debate, and the value of the conclusions is gone, and confidence in them lost.

Now, the church feels the growing demand of the age for discussion, even of its right to be. At first it was, "Away, I'll not fight with thee!" But when the Freethinker retorts with, "Then liv to be the show and gaze of the time!" it sees how necessary it is to hav "all the modern improvements," including Christian apologetics. Apologies, so called, by writers who condescend to appeal for their faith at the bar of reason are a great concession from "Thus saith the Lord."

So the church takes a turn in science, forgetting that nature's temple must be entered naked and humbly bent into the shape of an interrogation point. The church goes to the door with a defiant summons to open, to surrender; or she tries to purchase by glittering eloquence, or to extort by denunciation, a prearranged response from the oracle.

But, as reason and science are so much in vogue, the church must harness them, or a fair imitation of them, to her chariot. Nay, even that will not do. She must submit to be rediscovered, if she can, by being mined for, not in the dust of the Middle Ages, by cowled monks, but by unfrocked, every-day, hard-headed, practical scientists, in the solid ground of fact.

Ah! but where would that lead to? "Would it be sure to lead to where we want it?" says the church.

Scientific men, who are mad after the exact, real, solid truth, don't care a button where it leads to, so long as they get there—a very great objection to this most unmanageable class. Because why? We don't want to discover the truth, but only to get support for our theories; and, if anything disagreeable turns up, cover it up quickly and say nothing.

That is the reason why the church shies like a horse at a bit of (scientific) paper. She wants to hold science gingerly, so that she can drop it quickly if it gets too hot. It is a jewel which fashion decrees to be worn, but it is a dangerous one for pet theories.

There is a whole literature growing up called Christian science, intended to accomplish the impossible; that is, to approach the religious question in the true spirit of inquiry, and at the same time lead to just the conclusion that is wanted.

For heaven's sake let us hav religious books and devotional rhapsodies which take everything they need for granted, and let us hav scientific truth in books that let polemics alone, but away with all garbling of science to make out a case for a cause which either lies utterly outside of science, or if not, should, like any other theory, take its chances in cold investigation.

What turns up that is thought to favor the church is hurried into publicity and cheered to the echo by non-critical congregations, while facts of an opposit tendency are glossed over, discredited, and side issues raised to divert attention.

The only safety for the immense vested interest calling itself Christianity is to bar all true research into the grounds of its claims. Again, the only safety for it is to avoid all appearance of doing so.

It makes me indignant again to hear dogmas, abhorrent, disgusting, and senseless, taken up and seriously expounded, that are to me like the tatters on the person of a tramp. We must worship not only the tramp but his rags, and such rags as may or may not belong to him.

Suppose all that is sprang originally from a Big Tramp, then I must take the mass or be damned. There is a book which must hav been written by dictation of the B. T., because he must be good and because the book is so good—though we are often told it must be good because it was dictated by the B. T. So this book must be worshiped as one of the appendages of the B. T. One of the characters in this book founded a church, and that church has ever since been manufacturing tail for the great kite which is to raise us all into the air. Once admit the B. T., the extremest rag of the kite-tail follows inevitably. Christianity prevails mainly by tiring out common sense in trying to follow and spot all the innumerable weak and rotten links of question-begged and gratuitously assumed connection between Theism and "calling and election." Feeling as I do that the chain breaks down utterly at every one of the links, how empty of interest seems the mass of dogma that is hung upon it! But is there any recognition of this in my parson's sermon? Oh, no! Why not? Because its rottenness is ineradicable, I conclude. So the plan is to emphasize the necessity of a first cause, and to pass right on to the come-to-Jesus business, as if the far and roundabout mental path between were of no possible consequence.

Reflecting, I conclude that the course of human thought and mental progress is interfered with in this nineteenth century and land of the free by vested interests, for nothing else could oppose such a front to needed improvement and changes in modes of thought. We hav a Levitical caste who, with their dependents, liv from the sale of merchandise which possesses value only for intellects with the proper twist. Like the Western Union, they must suppress the world-overturning though humanity-blessing discoveries of an Edison, if they do not wish to hav their out-of date machinery superseded, and themselvs, perhaps, shelved. HOPEFUL HARDPAN.

Two Light-Circle Seances.

The phenomena exhibited at Mr. Keeler's light-circle séances, as I am about to describe them, will tax the credulity of everybody who has not witnessed the highest phase of spirit manifestation. I might say in advance, as the magician Harry Kellar said after witnessing certain manifestations in Calcutta in 1882:

I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before, I should not hav believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances.

The triangular inclosure at the light-circle séance is the same as I described at the dark-circle performance. On two sides there is solid wall, with the exception of a foot of sliding door, making the dimensions of the triangle six feet on two sides, and from eight to nine on the curtained front. The curtain in the light circle is lowered to a hight of four and one-half feet. In the inclosure is placed a small table, on one corner of which is fastened a telegraph instrument. All this is plainly seen before the curtain is fastened across. It is one continuous piece of black muslin, and is attached by rings to a cord tightly drawn, and has a flap about eighteen inches wide at the top. There is no break in this curtain, except sometimes a little tear where a second curtain has to be hooked on, which I will presently describe.

Three chairs are placed side by side closely in front of this dark curtain. Mr. Keeler selects two persons to sit with him. He takes his seat on the right-hand chair. A second curtain, eight or nine feet long, is now fastened at the end where Mr. Keeler sits. The other two sitters take the other two chairs. Mr. Keeler grasps the arm of the second sitter with both his hands. The third sitter takes the right wrist of his companion with his left hand. His right arm is free, and in sight all the time.

The second curtain is now drawn across the whole front, completely covering the three persons except their heads, and the right arm of the third one, which comes out through an arm-hole. The second curtain is fastened by hooks to the first around each sitter's neck. The flap of the first curtain is divided at intervals behind the heads of the sitters.

The light is now turned partly down, but we can all see the features of the three sitters against the dark screen. All keep quiet for a few moments while gentle music is played on the piano or a music-box.

The first person selected by Mr. Keeler to sit with him was my aunt. She was asked to roll up her left sleeve in order to feel more perceptibly the grasp of his two hands. But as she could not conveniently do this, he took her naked wrist in his left hand and her clothed arm in his right. She was told to speak if, at any time, he let go his hold. A gentleman selected by Mr. Keeler took the third seat. He held my aunt's right hand in his left, and all three were covered with the second curtain, from neck to feet, except the right arm of the third sitter.

In a few moments the third sitter said he began to feel himself touched, as if by hands from behind. Then my aunt said she, too, felt the hands—two of them, with all the fingers pressing at once. The pressure began softly, but grew harder. The heads and bodies of the sitters were moved, and my sensitiv aunt feared the spirits would be too violent.

A guitar had been placed on the little table in the inclosure. Pretty soon it began to be thrummed. It was out of tune and the first fret was gone, as I had already noticed, so that no good music could hav been produced on it; nor did the invisible hand at any time attempt to play a tune.

Presently the guitar came rumbling through the chairs of the sitters. It got on the lap of the third one, and there, underneath the outer curtain, we heard it thrummed. It went then upon my aunt's lap, and there it was played upon. It went back into the inclosure, and there continued playing. Again it came out underneath the chairs, and was played at the feet of Mr. Keeler. Once more it returned to the inclosure, and was held up above the curtain, all of it visible but a part of the neck. There it was waved back and forth. It struck each of the two gentlemen on the head. My aunt, whose head is extremely sensitiv, begged that it would not strike her, and it only made feints to hit her head. Sometimes the hand that held the neck of the instrument was seen for a moment above the curtain.

The manager handed a walking-stick to the spirit behind the curtain. It was taken and held upright. Then he took a tambourine and placed it on the top of the stick. The tambourine began to spin on the stick. After spinning some time, it disappeared behind the curtain, and was played on just as George Christy, the minstrel, used to play it. The instrument was then thrown out onto the floor.

Another tambourine without the bells was passed in, together with two broken clothes-pins, for the spirit minstrel to use as drumsticks. A lively tune was played on the piano by one of the spectators, and "George" beat an accompaniment on the tambourine and guitar with those clothes-pins as expertly as any drummer could do.

And now came a performance which few will believe possible—nothing short of a miracle. Mr. Keeler's coat, which he certainly had on when he took his seat, came flying over from behind the curtain, and it fell on the manager's back.

Then the manager handed over the curtain some short lead-pencils and two or three small paper tablets. Presently we could hear the sound of a paper stripped off a tablet, and over the screen came a leaf with a message written upon it in pencil. The manager picked it up, and taking it to the light, read the signature only. One of the spectators recognized it, and the paper was handed to him. In this way everyone present received one message or more. My aunt got one from her husband; my wife one from her mother; and I one from my brother, which, as a specimen, I now transcribe:

Teach me the way to come more fully in rapport with you. You can be used for these works. Sit for us; you will be led. DAVID M. BURR.

A change of sitters was now ordered, and as the three were uncovered Mr. Keeler was in his shirt-sleeves. He put on his coat, and now the two sitters were selected, not by him, but by the spirit guide. The manager pointed to each of us in turn, saying, "This one?" and three raps from behind the curtain indicated the spirit's choice.

The performances were now repeated with some variations. The guitar was played, the tambourine was beaten, and the bells were rung. More messages were written. My aunt requested one in French, and the answer was three raps, meaning yes. Presently there came a paper containing a greeting in good French—four words—signed with her husband's initials.

Most of the messages came over the curtain, but a few of the papers were plainly seen coming right through the unbroken cloth. They came at different points, and were uncrumpled. There was positivly no break in the cloth where such papers, four inches long and two or three quarters wide, could hav come through. I examined the cloth beforehand, and so did my wife.

And now each one of us was in turn invited to come up and get a message written by a visible hand. The hand pointed to each one in turn from over the curtain as a signal to come up. We took a Japanese tray with a paper tablet upon it; this we held up to the curtain just over the shoulders of the sitters, sometimes between Mr. Keeler and the next man and sometimes between the second and third sitters. Out came a hand and naked fore-arm, projecting from the unbroken curtain. It then proceeded to write on the tablet for each one of us a few words, signing them G. C., i. e., George Christy. The writing was generally difficult to read, and my message appeared to be as follows:

Too warm and close here. Until to-morrow. G. C.

I saw the hand and fore-arm coming out of the curtain. Then it was partially covered by the flap, and I saw the ends of the fingers writing the message, the rest of the hand being covered by the flap. When the message was completed, the finger tapped my hand and withdrew. This writing was done between the shoulders of Mr. Keeler and the next man; but some had their messages written between the other two men, where Mr. Keeler's arm could not possibly hav reached. And my aunt got hers written while she held the tray over the head of the middle sitter. We could all see the hand reaching over the top of the curtain as it wrote. And when the message was completed the hand grasped that of my aunt eagerly, and drew it away vigorously before parting.

At the request of the medium or spirit, none of us read his message until the close of the séance, when there was more light. The first one obtained by my aunt was this:

Come up here in a few minutes and let me write a line or two here. I want to grasp your hand once again.

Not until after the grasping of her hand did she know the contents of that first message.

Two evenings later my wife and I attended another light circle. Mr. Keeler selected a gentleman and myself to sit with him. I sat farthest from Mr. Keeler, and held the right hand of the second sitter in my left. Soon he and I felt our backs touched as if by human hands. The other manifestations followed. Mr. Keeler's vest was thrown out upon the floor. How many will believe me when I say that as it fell it was buttoned up? Yet the twenty other spectators will affirm the fact.

A change of sitters was made, and when Mr. Keeler was uncovered he was without a vest, but his coat was on. All present will testify that he had on a vest when he took his seat.

At the second sitting my wife was chosen by the spirit guide to sit beside Mr. Keeler. He had his coat on, but no vest. While she felt his two hands grasping her naked arm there was a jerk and his coat came flying out from behind the curtain.

The guitar performance was repeated, and at one time the instrument was played on while we all saw the large end of it protruding outside of the curtain, between the feet of Mr. Keeler and those of Mrs. Burr, their four feet being also thrust out and visible.

A third change of sitters was made, and this time Mr. Keeler put on his vest, but not his coat, the weather being quite warm. By and by his vest came flying out as before, and when the covering was removed again he was without coat or vest.

I hav spoken of a telegraph instrument attached to the little table behind the screen. This was now used by the invisible spirit. An operator was present, and when a doubt arose about the name signed to a message written by the spirit, the gentleman requested it to be spelled out by the telegraphic alphabet. This was done, and it was followed by a long dialog between the gentleman and George Christy or some other spirit working the instrument. The gentleman would put the question orally, and the spirit would answer by telegraphic ticks. This went on until some of us grew impatient for a continuation of the written messages, and the result was that comparativly few of these were received. But already I had received a written message from my sister, and my wife one from her niece. As before, every message was recognized by the person for whom it was written, there was never a mistake in the signature, and each handwriting was different.

And one remarkable thing was that the telegraph operator got a message written in dots and lines with a pencil. The signature I could read, being in ordinary handwriting, but the message itself, in the Morse alphabet, I got the gentleman to read to me. He said that was his first attendance at a séance, but he had got some slate-writing shortly before in the telegraphic characters.

During the performance a gentleman who had sat with Mr. Keeler requested the privilege of looking over the curtain into the inclosure. The request was granted by the spirit. As he came close to the curtain and looked into the vacant corner the noises ceased. Then he would withdraw a little distance and they would begin. The tambourine would be played on and the bells rung. Again and again he looked over and drew back, with the same result. When the séance was ended that gentleman said: "I hav been investigating these phenomena nine months, attending a séance about twice a month on an average. I hav been a skeptic, but I am now a believer in the spirits. While I was looking over into the vacant corner behind the curtain I saw three hands at one time come out through the curtain—three hands with no body behind them."

One more letter will probably complete all I wish to say on this subject. W. H. BURR.

A Protege of Ingersoll's.

There is a terrible awakening in Bloomington, Ill., where resides Private Joe Fifer, the brilliant lawyer who has just received the Republican nomination for governor, as it is hinted, yea, it is even asserted, that he and his partner are both admirers of that horrible Ingersoll. It is shocking, perfectly shocking, but Fifer studied law in the office of the great pagan, and imbibed so much of his heresy that he is actually uncertain on the Confession of Faith, and lacks other important requisits for the success of the g. o. p. How Illinois can ever recover from such a calamity is an elongated conundrum. In 1883, Fifer's partner, Mr. Phillips, was nominated for mayor, but was badly knifed by the Republican devotees of the devil, otherwise the God, -fearing element. By the church-going people "Ingersollism," as it is called, is regarded as the incarnation of cussedness. Letters are "pouring in," it is asserted, from "leading" Republicans who affirm that if Fifer is shaky on the Christian faith in any form, shape, or manner, they will not only vote against him but use all their energies to defeat him. Still there are some sappy Liberals who see no necessity for the American Secular Union, not even when the Apostle's Creed is more of a prerequisit to a position of honor than integrity or capacity. It is safe to say that Mr. Fifer will receive some votes in Chicago which he otherwise would not, provided he shows no white feather during the canvass.

It ought to be of interest, and possibly a matter of information, to many American Freethinkers to learn that a powerful German organization of Liberals, whose platform is nearly identical with the Nine Demands, is working to aid us in the work of Secularization of the state, or rather we are aiming to aid them, as, with proverbial forethought, these Teutonic Radicals were the first who realized the necessity for the preservation of religious freedom.

The North Side Turner Hall was profusely decorated Sunday, May 20th, in honor of the thirteenth biennial convention of the North American Turner Bund. As this session was expected to be a memorable one, where the battle between conservatism and radicalism should be fought, the three hundred delegates expressed in form and feature intellectual and physical vigor. Nearly every state and territory was represented by the intellectual athletes who demonstrated the truism of a sound body for a sound mind.

In addition to the usual business several vital questions demanded solution. They were:

1 Should the Bund approve the policy pursued by the editor of the official organ, Der Amerikanische Turn Zeitung, during the past two years?

2. Should Turners identify themselvs with a paper which sympathized with the condemned Anarchists, and denounced their hanging as judicial murder?

3. Shall the organ of the Bund be permitted to assail religion, or denounce those who were loyal to European monarchies or mourn the death of a crowned head? And, as the Constitution left everyone free, was not such conduct a violation of the Constitution?

It seems there are persons who do not read the English Freethought papers who are unable to distinguish between an advocate of Anarchy and one who simply demands justice for Anarchists, and that ever since the Haymarket tragedy the Turners hav been considerably torn up on that question, seeing that some of their societies contributed money toward the Anarchists' defense fund, and August Spies was the presiding officer, a few years ago, of the Aurora Turn Verein, and was a delegate to the biennial convention.

During the trial C. Herman Boppe, editor of the Turn Zeitung and Der Freidenker, of Milwaukee, expressed sympathy with them and boldly denounced their execution as judicial murder, for which he has been bitterly assailed by the conservativs. It was THE TRUTH SEEKER'S experience with German variations—a mixture of misrepresentations, with a prevalence of moral cowardice. No one has assailed Anarchy more earnestly than Editor Boppe—except it might be Editor Macdonald. Still, when pens were silent and mouths were closed through fear, Boppe rose to the attitude of a moral hero, demanding justice for his enemies.

The North Side Turn Gemiende, composed of the wealthiest German Liberals, wanted to be counted in favor of popular prejudice, and from that quarter dissensions in the Bund were largely fermented. Among its membership are many aspiring politicians, whose moral vertebræ is proverbially weak, so they denounced Boppe as an Anarchist, and demanded his deposition and the establishment of a new official organ.

President Dr. Starkloff, of St. Louis, delivered a strong, courageous opening address, showing the injustice of the imputations heaped upon Editor Boppe.

The secretary's report showed a total membership of 29,147—an increase of 2 425; also, that the societies generally had protested against the various bills introduced to restrict immigration; and that they had advocated the formation of personal liberty leagues to fight Prohibition.

The election of Carl Eberhardt, of Boston, as temporary chairman, and subsequently that of Lieber, of New York, to the presidency, demonstrated that the Radicals had a clear majority, to which credit is largely due Frank Stauber and Carl Plum for the missionary work they recently performed on the Pacific coast.

The committees worked all morning, Monday. In the afternoon a sad circumstance was reported—the sudden death of Delegate Adelbert Krieger, of Dayton, O.

Among the letters and dispatches was one bearing the seal of the American Secular Union, as follows:

To the Officers and Delegates Thirteenth Biennial Convention North American Turn Bund: The American Secular Union hereby sends greeting to its German compatriots who first planted organization in this republic to counteract insidious ecclesiastical encroachment. Though divided by language, we are one in purpose. May you succeed in making Freethought the synonym for moral heroism, intellectual grandeur, and freedom universal. Yours for universal mental liberty, E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

The reading of the names of the president and leading vice-presidents was received with prolonged applause.

It took a five hours' session of bitter wrangling to adopt the majority report of the committee on the official organ, which was in substance: "That the Amerikanische Turn Zeitung be retained as the official organ, and that its editor was entitled to the thanks of the convention."

The minority submitted a report to limit the power of the editor.

The conservativ line of attack was simply a reiteration of the following points: Boppe is an uncompromising republican—a foe of monarchism and monarchies. We are republicans, but at the same time we are loyal admirers of the German kaiser, of the Hohenzollerns, Bismarck, and the vaterland. He (Boppe) attacked us when we publicly expressed our sorrow over Emperor William's death. We belong to an anti-religious organization—that is, the Turner Bund—but at the same time we don't want to see religion attacked. Moreover, some of us are good believers in God and religion ourselvs. We are progressiv people, but respect public opinion, and would prefer radicalism to be practiced in private.

To these attacks Editor Boppe replied that he did not attempt to represent every temporary current of opinion in the organization; he would exercise his individuality. The reactionists had not induced him to abandon an inch the position he had occupied for ten years. They threatened the organization with graver danger than the Anarchists. The venal press had corrupted the organization. The principles of the Bund were utterly incompatible with Anarchism or Communism. If his course in regard to that dastardly trial made him an Anarchist, then he was proud of it. He would hav been forever ashamed of himself had he not opposed that butchery. At best, the death penalty was a barbarous institution, worthy of Russia. He was a born republican, and never would fall down and worship the Hohenzollerns who banished and executed the republicans in 1848. Prolonged applause greeted the editor's manly defense, which was followed by a venomous personal attack from a member of his own delegation, but the majority report was adopted by a vote of three to one—421 against 158.

As a mollification for the conservativs, a resolution was adopted the following day declaring that, while the Turners stood for liberty, they also stood for law and order.

Memorial services were held over the remains of the deceased delegate, and the remains escorted to the depot.

The committee on platform reported an important change, which was adopted—the striking out of that portion which demanded the abolition of the United States Senate.

After a four days' session, during which a vast amount of important business was transacted, President Lieber closed the convention with a speech calculated to bring about harmony, and it adjourned.

E. A. STEVENS.

Senator Blair's Proposed Sunday Law.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Allow me to again call the attention of your readers to the bill introduced, on May 21st, into the United States Senate, forbidding not only "any secular work, labor, or business to the disturbance of others" (works of necessity, mercy, and humanity excepted), but also "any play, game, amusement, or recreation, to the disturbance of others, on the first day of the week, commonly known as the Lord's day, in any place subject to the exclusiv jurisdiction of the United States." Another section provides that no mails shall be carried on Sunday, nor "any mail matter be collected, assorted, handled, or delivered," except in time of war, or cases of death or illness.

This latter section is such a gross violation, not only of existing usage, but of the known wish of the people, that it cannot pass if proper attention is given by the friends of freedom. It is, unfortunately, much easier to make bad laws than to repeal them; and the introduction of this bill probably means that some sort of Sabbatarian legislation is likely to be supported powerfully. The purport of the first section is not clear to me. I do not wish to hav people on sickbeds, or in church, disturbed by brass bands, or noisy games at baseball, or the cries of pedlars, on Sunday; but, before this bill passes, I want to be sure that no one will be enabled by it to prosecute his neighbors for disturbing his peace of mind by quietly fishing, or weeding their gardens, or playing lawn-tennis. If any more Sunday legislation is needed, it should be in words that cannot be misunderstood. Judging the first section by the second, I must suppose the whole bill to be an outrageous attack on individual liberty. At all events, it is high time for us to consider whether we wish to hav any letter or newspaper which may be on its way to us, or to anyone else, at the close of the week delayed for at least twenty-four hours in deference to Sabbatarian prejudices. F. M. HOLLAND.

BLAIR'S BLUING-BAG.
From the New York World.

It is of course not necessary to consider seriously Senator Blair's bill to restore the Puritan Sunday by act of Congress. It would be quite as practicable to carry the world back to the other primitiv Puritan customs as to the observance of Sunday that prevailed two hundred years ago.

To be entirely consistent Mr. Blair should hav provided for the killing of witches—perhaps substituting electricity for fire, as a concession to the spirit of the nineteenth century—and directed that people be fined for staying away from church. If a part of the old Blue laws is to be revived, under national sanction, the cerulean hue should be impartially distributed. To stop the mails and forbid travel except in private carriages would not be enough.

Mr. Blair's latest exhibition of crankiness would hardly be worth notice if the Senate had not already encouraged him in eccentricities that hav cost the taxpayers large sums of money, with no return. The pointless inquiries which he has set afoot and the printing that he has procured hav cost more than his services could possibly be worth for a hundred years, while the surplus-squandering schemes which he has fathered would bankrupt the nation.

New Hampshire would confer a great boon on the country if she could find some home use for the eccentric and highly reformatory Mr. Blair.

Our London Letter.

It is difficult for the lay mind to see the connection between religious opinions and the "plan of campaign," but the pope appears to think they are very closely allied, when he condemns the latter in his decree to the Irish bishops, and says he does not wish to interfere with the political difficulties now existing. He has probably discovered that the parish priests and their flocks are not quite so subservient as they were formerly, and if he goes too far he may lose the brightest gem in the papal crown. With all his desire to oblige the present English government in return for certain concessions, he may not find it quite so paying a game as he contemplated. It can not be a pleasant thing to know the head of the Nationalist party is a heretic, and it might be very gratifying to divest him of his power, even at the expense of the wretched tenantry of Ireland, if the cost to the treasury was not too great. Altogether it is a miserable business, but if the terms of the papal letter are insisted on, it may turn out so much the better for an emancipated people.

Clerical rascality has been freely exposed of late, and the cry for disestablishment is growing louder. There is no question but that it must come sooner or later; and the later the better, for if it were done quickly large compensation would be claimed and allowed—though why a parson should be better entitled to compensation than a tradesman who has failed because his wares are going out of fashion it is difficult to say. The relations between the state clergy and their parishioners are rather strained at times, so much so that two or three free fights hav been recorded in the vestries connected with churches. The Nonconformists are not much better, and the "down-grade" controversy, started by Spurgeon, has had its effect elsewhere. So far, at present, the supporters of genuin hell-fire are in the majority, though it does not appear they anticipate having experience of it themselvs, only reserving the article for unbelievers.

The annual Exeter Hall dissipations are now in full swing, but there is nothing particularly new regarding them. The same old lies are told of the benefi-cent results of missionary enterprise, and the necessity urged of more money—which is apparently kept in a bottomless sack, for the repository of the cash of the faithful is never full.

A prophetic conference is, I believe, the only new feature of the long list of meetings. It must hav been very interesting. Its prophets all followed in the wake of Jeremiah, of dismal memory. Within the next three years there are to be fearful wars in Europe, and twenty-three kingdoms will be reduced to ten. Between 1897 and 1901 millions of Christians will be massacred, and pestilence, famin, and earthquakes will be the order of the day. On March 5, 1896, 144 000 Christians will be translated bodily to the celestial regions, and April 11, 1901, Christ is to descend on the earth. The late prophet Daniel is made responsible for all this bloody business, as is clearly proved by the champion seer, Baxter, but as this individual interprets Daniel's mental wanderings differently every time he examins them, perhaps the dates now fixed will be further postponed, as on previous occasions.

If there was any possibility of these things coming to pass, the rush of American excursionists to see the fun would be so great that the famin portion would speedily be realized, unless they brought their own provisions with them. J. D.

Charles Watts's Friendly View.

From Secular Thought.

Some weeks since, I drew the attention of the readers of this journal to the progress of Secular principles in Canada; my recent visits to the States enable me to record that a similar advancement is apparent there. I hav recently been to Pittsburgh, Garrettsville, Massillon, Chicago, Stewardson, Strasburg, Grand Rapids, and Saginaw, and delivered at these various places twenty-four lectures. Thus an opportunity has been afforded me to see the condition of our movement on the other side of the border, and to observe the elements at work in the American Freethought propaganda.

At all my lectures the audiences hav been large and enthusiastic, and the Sunday meetings were crowded. One pleasing feature in the gatherings was the many ladies present. This is a good and encouraging sign, for the success of the Secular cause depends largely upon our wives and daughters coöperating with us. Woman wields a power for good or for evil that cannot be overestimated. Against us, she frequently fetters the actions of husband and sons, thus robbing us of valuable help; with us, she not only inspires those around her to action, but she adds the weight of her own power, the force and benefit of which are only fully known to those who hav witnessed its advantages in such an organization as our own.

The earnestness and fidelity to profession manifested by the real workers in the Secular movement throughout the States deserve all praise. Actuated by a desire to advance principles dear to them, they toil, often at a pecuniary loss to themselvs, to benefit their kind, to enhance the power of ethical culture, and to enlarge the scope of mental freedom. Unfortunately, such noble work is left far more than it should be to the few, while the many manifest an indifference which is ofttimes most unjustifiable, devolving upon the few willing workers the whole of the labor which should be shared by all. It is to be feared that this drawback to our movement will continue, both in Canada and in the States, until all those who profess to be Freethinkers recognize it as their duty to do something to extend that freedom to others which they themselvs enjoy as a legacy from the dauntless pioneers in the past. It is not enough to be free oneself—persistent efforts should be made to liberate those who are still bound by the chains of traditional belief and priestly domination.

Secularists in the States hav some excellent journals to represent their views. THE TRUTH SEEKER is solid, and conducted by one of the best editors that ever filled an editorial chair. The Boston Investigator is varied and interesting, presided over by a noble veteran in the cause of liberty, one who knows what to do and how to do it. The Ironclad Age is bold and defiant, and its editor is as fearless as he is able. The Freethinkers' Magazine expounds the very genius of Freethought in a lofty and dignified fashion. Truth, published by the Pittsburgh friends, is calm, discriminating, and excellent in tone, while the new venture in California bids fair to become an efficient exponent of Liberalism in the West.

The platform is also well represented in the States. Besides Colonel Ingersoll, who, of course, stands alone as an orator, there are B. F. Underwood, Remsburg, Jamieson, Putnam, Reynolds, Dr. York, Burnham, Miss Gardener, Mrs. Freeman, and Miss De Cleyre. Of such exponents in the press and on the platform America ought to be proud. And we are glad to see that special efforts are to be made at the coming Congress at Pittsburgh, in October, to organize practical work.

We regret to notice that of late the usefulness of the American Secular Union has been somewhat impaired through the existence of some misunderstanding among certain of its officials. We still more regret to see the very undignified tone imparted, and the publicity given to the discussion of questions at issue. Let us hope that all this will be set right at the next Congress, and that harmony and due regard to principles will be then the order of the day. The delegates who may assemble on that occasion should decide what is to be done, and the best means of doing it. In the next place, those who can work to carry out what is there and then decided upon should do their best to aid in carrying out the adopted program. If there should be any who cannot coöperate to further the conclusions arrived at by the Congress, let them work in their own way, but, for the sake of the principles, which are higher than men, we trust no one will do anything to impair the Union, or to retard the Secular work its friends aim to accomplish. We understand that the earnest workers at Pittsburgh and the untiring secretary, E A. Stevens, are doing their level best to make the coming convention what it should be. In these laudable efforts they deserve that all possible support should be given them. Personally, I shall deem it a pleasing duty to assist in promoting whatever is calculated to defeat the common enemy, and to advance the truth as it is in the liberty of Freethought and the practical teachings of Secular philosophy.

Mr. Bradlaugh at Home.

From the North Wilts, Eng., Herald, March 23, 1888.

An interview with Mr. Bradlaugh appeared in last evening's Pall Mall Gazette, from wh ch we extract the following passages: Mr. Bradlaugh's study and library, which are combined in one, is a large, airy apartment over a music shop in St. John's Wood. The room is well lighted, and the shelves are filled with dog-eared and well-used books, to which some attempt has been made to introduce order by numbering with white labels. Conspicuous on one of the shelves immediately behind Mr. Bradlaugh's desk, so as to be accessible for use, is a copy of the Bible, while the shelves above are filled with bound volumes of the National Reformer, a journal in which Mr. Bradlaugh's life and doings are written at large from day to day for the benefit of his disciples and the general public. There is something elephantine about the man, alike in his imposing physique, his small but impressiv eyes, and the wonderful upper lip, which is much the most distinctiv of his features. Mr. Bradlaugh is aging somewhat in appearance, and his "lyart haffets wearing thin and bare" promis before long to reduce the head of the member for Northampton to the condition of that of Bismarck, whose three hairs hav long ago become proverbial. Yet Mr. Bradlaugh is only fifty-five years old according to the almanac; but, as he remarked, he is four centuries old in work, which no doubt accounts for the fact that he has a look of age beyond his years.

Referring to the Oaths bill, Mr. Bradlaugh said: "I think the bill is certain to get through the House of Commons. After Whitsuntide, bills that hav already made certain progress will hav precedence over those which hav yet to be read a second time, and then my bill will go up to the House of Lords. I think the bishops ought to support the bill, even if it does go much farther than the mere question of Parliamentary oath. I should hav been the meanest scoundrel alive if I had contented myself with a bill abolishing Parliamentary oaths while I left all other oaths intact. There is not a week passes in which I do not receive letters and petitions from victims who hav been compelled to choose between using a form of words in which they do not believe and being excluded from the performance of their duties as citizens. . . . I know at the present moment a round dozen of justices all of whom hav been sworn but none of whom could take the oath legally, according to the law laid down in the case of the Attorney-general vs. Bradlaugh. These men are constantly acting in a magisterial capacity, and all their acts are invalid by virtue of their not having been properly sworn."

Asked what would be his next point of attack, Mr. Bradlaugh declined to say, but remarked: "We shall not rest content until we hav established perfect equality before the law—in short, not until we hav realized the idea that is set forth in the program of the National Secular Society. The object of the National Secular Society is to agitate for the removal of all laws which impose any penalty or disability with regard to religious belief. Of course, that goes very far, for it includes disestablishment, and its realization is incompatible with the compulsory teaching of any form of religious belief in national schools. It is for this object the National Secular Society was formed, and with its attainment, its object of existence having been achieved, there would no longer be any reason for it to continue its operations; for it has never been constituted as a church, nor has it any functions other than those of a militant body, organized for the purpose of attack against any system of religious inequality." Describing his method of life, Mr. Bradlaugh said: "I am constantly lecturing. I lecture in order to liv. The pen is but a weak instrument for making a living compared with the voice. I lecture as a rule four times a week—thrice on a Sunday and once in the week, and contrive to make as much on the two days as will keep me over the seven. This is the way it is done," said Mr. Bradlaugh, and crossing the library, he pointed to two huge bills which were spread on the floor announcing that Mr. Bradlaugh was to deliver three lectures on the following Sunday at Huddersfield, to which admission could be had for 6d. and 3d. "People," said he, "take the hall, issue these bills, and invite me to lecture, charging for admission. Money thus received is devoted in the first place to recouping the expenses in the hiring of the hall and the printing of the bills, and anything that remains over is mine. Sometimes there is a good deal; sometimes I do not make my railway fare, but on the whole I contrive to make a living. It involves constant traveling for eight months in the year. I should say that I travel five hundred miles a week. The remaining four months I average perhaps two hundred miles. So that I am kept pretty busy in meeting my engagements. The number of lectures which I hav to giv gratuitously for the benefit of various causes is a very heavy tax. It is the only thing that I can giv, and I cannot refuse the calls that are made upon me. It is hard work to keep things going," said Mr. Bradlaugh, cheerily, "for I hav not only to maintain myself, but also to defray the enormous costs which hav accumulated against me. I hav reduced them somewhat, but there are still some £1 800 due."

Sunday Service and the "Mail and Express."

From the Hebrew Standard.

In connection with a lecture of Rev. Dr. Gottheil on Baruch Spinoza, delivered on a recent Sunday, and published in the columns of the Mail and Express, that paper directs attention to the introduction of Sunday lectures in various Jewish temples, and draws from it the conclusion that the Jews are drawing closer to Christianity, and will soon recognize the cross as the symbol of salvation, and surrender their monotheism to the belief in a trinity. Every Jew is fully aware of the fallacy of this deduction. Between lectures on Sunday and dedicating a temple on the Christian Sabbath, there is yet a vast gulf between Judaism and Christianity. The Jews cannot possibly believe in the divinity of Jesus. They cannot believe in the divinity of any human being. It is against the very foundation of their religion. It is spiritual suicide. They cannot help it that Christians must needs hav a human being as mediator between God and man, and are probably proud of the fact that bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh, a son of Israel, was selected for that highest position in the gift of man, but they cannot overlook the fact that their ancestors saw Jesus of Nazareth walk and speak and preach, eat and drink, liv and die, as a human being, and can never believe in him as a God. It is against their nature, their understanding, their reasoning power, to deify man or to humanize God. The lectures delivered by Jewish rabbis on Sunday abound with logic and reason, and are the strongest protest against mysteries like trinitheism, transfiguration, transubstantiation, and other ingenious inventions of subtle scholastics which hav confused the minds of Christian congregations, befogged their reasoning powers, and led them captiv in the meshes of undigested, obscure theological nomenclatures.

The Jews on the average hav a clear, keen, and sharp intellect, with which they cut through the most skilfully woven nets; and they will insist to call a spade a spade, and nothing else, until it is clearly demonstrated that a spade is something else in reality and not merely so called.

They do not object to Colonel Shepard hugging a phantom and calling it God, or a great lawyer abdicating his reason on the bidding of a jugg'ing woman, or Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby, with sickly sentimentality, bewailing the refusal of the Jews to prepare for paradise by accepting their own flesh and blood as a divine substance, but they must be excused from following them in that tortuous path of credulous God-making. Don't deceive yourself or your readers, colonel. The Jews are not of the retrograding material. Medieval superstition and bigotry could not darken their vision, and the bright sun of civilization will certainly not obscure their sight and cloud their conceptions.

Ingersoll on Conkling.

From the Minneapolis, Minn., Tribune of May 12th.

Elsewhere in this morning's Tribune is printed an oration on the late Roscoe Conkling by Robert G. Ingersoll. It was delivered last evening in the Academy of Music, at Albany, under the auspices of the New York general assembly, and is one of Mr. Ingersoll's noblest efforts. Full of the great orator's splendid imagery, strong in its vigorous English, and grandly impressiv in its stately, rhythmic flow, the oration is a splendid tribute of one grand American to the memory of another. Never were two men more different in character, talent, and personality than the eulogist and his subject. Individually incomparable, yet diametrically opposit. Both orators in the highest and truest sense. Conkling the thunderbolt of eloquence; Ingersoll the brilliant lightning flashing zigzag through the sky. Conkling grand, impressiv, superb, logical, forcible, convincing; Ingersoll keen, incisiv, glorious, picturesque, fascinating, winning. Conkling chose his line of argument and never deviated. Every phrase was set and polished, every point calm and logical, and every conclusion apt and forceful. His flowers of rhetoric were few, but choice, and anything which fell below the highest plane of cold reason seldom found a place in his remarks. Everything he said marked the austere and haughty personality of the man. He was an intellectual giant, and he looked with disdain upon pigmies. Persistent in purpose and incorruptible in principle, Roscoe Conkling grew in greatness in spite of faults which would hav dragged down a man of less rugged strength of character. How different Ingersoll! Towering above his fellows in those gifts which mark genius, yet as easily approachable as a child. Kindly, whole-souled, genial, democratic, he makes and keeps friends where Conkling made enemies. With an oratorical power as rare in rhetorical beauty and play of fancy as it is marvelous in varied learning and convincing force. Yet Ingersoll, too, has been hampered in his career by religious opinions which hav deprived him of all public acknowledgment of his great abilities.

There is a strange similarity between the two men, yet the widest dissimilarity, and that each should hav been the friend and admirer of the other's transcendent abilities is perhaps stranger still. Mr. Ingersoll's eulogy will rank with the oratorical gems of this generation.

Communications.

Rotten Eggs and Dirt for Infidels.

L. K. WASHBURN'S EXPERIENCE AMONG THE BLUE-NOSES.

From the Investigator.

The result of a lengthy correspondence with Mr. Frank Wooster was an engagement with that gentleman to giv five lectures in Grand Manan, New Brunswick. Grand Manan is an island about twenty miles from Eastport. You can go there when the boat goes. There is a blissful uncertainty about the arrangements for travel by boat. It depends upon the weather, or the freight, or something else, when you leave. The island lies at the mouth of the bay of Fundy, and is about twenty miles long and three miles wide. The steamer that runs to this place has a captain by the name of Ingersoll! A Liberal ought to feel safe where that name is.

When I reached the wharf I met Capt. Warren Cheney, who was partly responsible for my engagement. He took me to a carriage where Mr. Wooster was waiting to welcome the first Liberal lecturer to Grand Manan. It seems that the Christians of the island had decided in their own minds that I should not deliver my lectures, and they concluded that the best way to carry out their intention was to hav the halls closed to me. At North Head, where is the steamboat landing, and which is the principal village of the island, I was to giv my first lecture Friday evening. The hall at this place had been engaged of the trustees—Capt. James A. Pettes, Mr. John Kent, and Mr. Lawson, the latter being a church-member.

A person by the name of Edmund Daggett, a magistrate of the island, who bears a somewhat unsavory reputation, was chiefly instrumental in "working up" the feeling against "the Infidels." This man had been away to get legal advice as to the best way to prevent the lectures, and he was on the steamer with me Thursday, and upon landing immediately communicated with his followers that he was armed with authority to break the engagement of the trustees and refuse Mr. Wooster and Captain Cheney the use of the hall for the lectures as advertised. The story reached our ears before we had driven through the village, and as it was thought best to hav the matter understood then and there, we drove to the house of one of the trustees, who acted as janitor of the hall, and inquired as to the truthfulness of the rumor.

Mr. Lawson confirmed the story, and said, "Esquire Daggett had just told him that we could not hav the hall." Messrs. Wooster and Cheney wanted to know under what authority Daggett was acting, and so sent for him. He came, and informed us very pompously that he had consulted with the lawyers upon the matter, and that he had forbidden the trustees to open the hall for the lectures. He refused to show his papers, and rising, said that "he did not wish to hold any further conversation with people who denied that the Bible was God's word!" Exit Daggett. Captain Pettes and Mr. Kent assured us that the doors would be opened on Friday night.

The evening arrived. Crowds of both sexes filled the street, anxious to see what the Infidels would do. After supper at the Marble Ridge Hotel, of which Captain Pettes is the proprietor, we prepared for the siege. As the hour for the lecture drew near the crowds increased, and as we walked toward the hall the people moved in the same direction. Daggett had gained possession of the key to the hall, and refused to giv it up, giving among other excuses that he had lost it. When it was made clear that the only way into the hall was to force the door, Captain Pettes performed this office with perfect ease. After lighting the lamps and getting a soap-box for a desk, we proceeded. The hall was filled with men and a few women.

After some brief remarks upon the spirit of modern persecution, and after repeating the invitation to the clergy of the island to debate the question, "Is the Bible the Word of God?" I read Mr. S. P. Putnam's poem, "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" and gave my lecture on "What Hav We to Fear from Atheism?" The music of a cow bell was furnished by an outside orchestra, which was intended to break off the meeting, but it was not successful.

While the audience was going out, the threatening report of a revolver was heard near the door. We had carried the day; we had entered the hall, and had the lecture as advertised, and the Christians had been defeated. After leaving the hall we had gone but a short distance when a peculiar report near our feet warned us that eggs were being thrown at us. Soon a shower of them fell, and two of our party of five were struck. I escaped. The miserable cowards who engaged in such contemptible work were fit tools of the man Daggett and his Christian employers. Twice were we bombarded with these missils, but no great harm was done.

A far more serious danger awaited us. The village of Castalia is about midway between North Head and Grand Harbor. This village is the home of the Sanctificationists, as they are called. These peculiar people are peculiar in their ignorance and piety. They hav a peculiar hatred for everyone that is not a Sanctificationist. We were riding through this place at 11 o'clock at night, not dreaming of foes or danger, when our carriage was suddenly checked in its course by a large rail across the street, placed there with the intention of injuring us on our way home.

Mr. Wooster and myself were in the forward team, and thus we were the ones to receive the shock. Captain Cheney and John Cheney were in the other team, and were anxious to find and punish the dastards who were guilty of such an act. After repeated attempts to find a live man we drove on, only to be again stopped, by a larger log than the first one. As we were somewhat prepared for the second stop, we accepted the situation more calmly. But think of wretches who would attempt the lives of their fellow-beings through religious hate! Has Christianity, after eighteen hundred years, no better fruit to exhibit than this?

On Saturday night I lectured at South Cove, in a hall owned by J. G. Frazer. The entire Christian force tried to induce Mr. Frazer to break his word with Mr. Wooster, and so prevent the lecture, but it did not succeed. Beyond a little dirt being thrown at us, at this place there was no sign of opposition.

The light of the nineteenth century has scarcely reached Grand Manan. The clouds of the Dark Ages still hang over the island. I hav never seen a more ignorant, superstitious, intolerant set of mortals. The general mass is relieved by a few splendid men, but they are out of their element in that benighted region. Mr. Turner Wooster, Mr. Frank Wooster, Capt. Warren Cheney, Mr. Albert Cheney, Captain Pettes, and a few others possess modern ideas and are Liberal-minded, intelligent men. I enjoyed my visit very much, and the kind hospitality of Mr. Turner Wooster and Captain Cheney.

California Letter.

After one hundred days among the Saints at Zion, I am right glad to be once more in my own home in the Garden City, now so beautiful in her new spring dress of green fields, fruits, and flowers, which were never more abundant and promising than at present. But as poetry is not my forte, I will not take up your valuable space in any attempt to set forth the every-day glories of the sunset slope, and will only say that California was never more prosperous, in city and country, than at present. Boom seems to be the magic word on every tongue, and the entire wide West is moving under the impulse of men and means from the eastern slope of our continent.

My work in Utah has been arduous, and yet, in many respects, most pleasant and opportune, as there is a new impulse in the mental life of this religion-cursed part of our country. My audiences hav been unprecedentedly large in Salt Lake, numbering from twelve to fifteen hundred, and often greatly overtaxed the capacity of the Opera House.

The people, largely Mormon, did not hav to be coaxed or dragged out, but came with such degree of willingness as to pack the house in thirty minutes after the doors were open, and that, too, in spite of the constant warnings of the Mormon press; showing clearly that the backbone of the Mormon beast is broken, and the young people especially are slipping away from the grasp of the priests and bishops of that most degrading and demoralizing system of religion.

And from the fact that the missionary efforts of orthodox sects are utterly futil in converting these people to any other form of Christianity, Utah bids fair to contain more Freethinkers, in proportion to the population, than any other similar area of our country.

When they conclude that God did not talk to Joseph Smith, and that he was an undoubted fraud, and that Brigham Young was a knave and a despot, they begin to doubt all so-called revelations, and place John on the Isle of Patmos and Jo Smith in the same boat, as gross impostors, or both suffering from hallucination or jimjams, and turn their attention to the study of natural science as the only cure for that mental disease called religion. And the gentiles and Liberals of Salt Lake are deserving of great credit for their long and faithful warfare to redeem the beautiful valleys of Utah from this virus of false religion, so destructiv to true womanhood, home, and family life, the fruitage of animalism and lust, disloyal to the government, and degrading to its subjects. And yet, aside from its polygamous aspects, it is quite as much entitled to credence and respect as the religion of the Catholic or Protestant Christian sect. Why not? They are all based upon so-called revelations; all are dealing with the unseen; all are requiring a belief in what none of them can prove, under the whip-lash of human authority; all are based upon a book, miracle, vision, or dream of some disordered mind.

I had quite as soon believe in Jo Smith's dreams, and the clairvoyant visions of Jo Smith's mother, saturated with ignorance and superstition, as divine revelations, as the crazy talk of Isaiah, John the Revelator, or the wonders recorded in the Testament spook-book of Christianity, and Mormons hav quite as sufficient ground for their monstrous fraud as hav the Christian sects who are so bitter against the Mormons.

And the only distinction worthy of note is that one is an old lie, time-honored with usage, fashionable in the extreme, and its hideous discrepancies, covered with rhetoric, music, and flowers, pass current for truth, while Mormonism is only a new lie struggling for existence against the mother who gave it birth—the legitimate child of Christianity and the Bible God. From choice giv me the new lie, as time will smooth away its glaring inconsistencies and make it as fashionable as the sister sects, and the Book of Mormon with age would become quite as much entitled to be called the word of God as any other Bible of religion.

Hence, you may see the utter hopelessness of the Christian cause in Utah. In fact, I was informed by a gentleman at Payson, in Utah valley, that the Presbyterian effort in that place in the conversion of Mormons during twelve years past had resulted in the expenditure of $30,000 and the conversion of one poor Mormon, who soon after discovered that he had leaped from the frying-pan into the fire, and left the church, headed for Freethought and mental freedom. And this is the status of Christian effort to convert Mormons by the various sects in Salt Lake and elsewhere in the territory.

They beg money in the East by missionary effort to build churches, under false representations of the Mormon religion and Mormon people, with no converts from the Mormon faith; while Secular thought and effort can number its converts by thousands in the territory, and thousands more on the way to the highlands of reason and common sense.

Utah is a most beautiful country, rich in soil, with a climate far surpassing that of the Eastern slope, and equaled only by California, as during the entire winter I hav felt no more discomfort from cold than in San José, where I hav lived for twenty-two years past.

The country is rich in minerals, sheep and cattle, and such other resources as fully assure its future greatness as soon and as fast as enterprising gentile people will come in and take the government of the country and cities out of the hands of these pseudo saints of God.

And to this end the Salt Lake Tribune stands, like a pillar of fire by night and by day, in defense of liberty and law, and a most powerful auxiliary in every effort to wipe out this ecclesiastical curse and slavery from this fair land. Long liv the old Tribune and the boys in blue who hav made life, property, and free speech possible so long in Zion!

Salt Lake City is certainly, from location and resources, bound to be in the near future a great railroad center and distributing-point, like Denver and Los Angeles, and only a few hundred more gentile votes are required to giv Salt Lake a government of the people, by the people, and to swing her into line with the other cities of our Union, so blessed and so free, under the stripes and stars of our dear country.

I gave fourteen Radical lectures in Salt Lake on Sunday nights, and from two to three lectures each week at other points in the territory. And my thanks are due in Salt Lake to all who helped me in my work, and especially to Messrs. Rogers, Howard, Godbee, Hammond, Lawrence, Wiscomb, Wellock, Steele, Thompson, Chittock, and others who helped to crown my work with success.

At Murray I gave two lectures, and on the first occasion was favored with the use of a large Mormon church for the lecture. At this point the genial, courteous Harry Haines stands in the front, and a bulwark he is against sham and delusion.

At Provo, a former hotbed of Mormon deviltry, I gave four nights to large audiences, who voted for my return although the bishop preached against me and stoutly refused the theater for my use. But thanks to Uncle Sam's court, then in session, and the courtesy of Judge Henderson, formerly of Michigan, I was accorded the court house, which was literally packed to overflowing.

I am happy to mention H. S. Brooks, Dr. Hennberg, and John Morwick for kindness in opening the way into this priest-ridden town. Dr. Hennberg and lady, who kindly entertained me during both visits at Provo, are highly cultured people. The doctor enjoys a fine practice in medicin; and his amiable wife is high up in fine art, and the walls of their unique and beautiful home show in profusion the skill of her cultivated hand and refined taste.

At Payson I lectured four nights to an audience of not less than seven hundred, five-sixths of which were Mormons. And this must be said to their credit, they are far more Liberal—i. e., the rank and file of Mormonism—than any other Christian sect. And I presume it is for the reason that Mormons believe a little in almost everything. And their system is a grand jumble and conglomeration of isms. Paganism from India to Jesus, Judaism, Mohammedanism, Jesuitism, Protestantism, and diabolism, well shaken before taken—you hav Mormonism. And, of course, their religion consisting of such diverse elements of faith, they are more open to argument than any other sect, for what they cannot prove by the Bible and Book of Mormon is not worth proving.

At Payson my thanks are due to Dr. Greer and his excellent wife, for entertainment and other material assistance. The doctor is a radical of radicals, and alive to the interests of Freethought. He has recently removed to Chicago, where he has property interests. I am sure he will be a valuable accession to the leadership of our cause in Chicago.

At Ogden our old friend J. A. Jost stands, as he has for many years, beating against the tide of hypocrisy and ecclesiastical deviltry. I spoke three nights to good audiences. And thanks are due at Ogden to friends Jost, Griffin, Martin, and especially James Axley, a young railroad man and a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for timely assistance with helping hand.

The work at Morgan, Coalville, and Kamas was well received, and my labor lightened by Messrs. Edholm, Williams, Sorenson, and others who stand on the walls of Secular Freethought.

And I take pleasure in making the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER acquainted with Wm. Reynolds, secretary of the territorial Secular Union, living at Wanship. All in that country know him, and love him for his sterling principles, and prompt and continued action in behalf of our noble cause. He is a live man, and writes more letters to friends to open the way and disseminate our principles than any ten persons in Utah. Ideas and action, must be the motto of Wm. Reynolds.

At Park City I lectured four nights in all, on two different occasions, on both of which occasions J. A. Williams took the wheel and piloted me through to success. Brother Williams is an old soldier of the Union and fought for her life, and is now accorded a high place among the brethren in the Grand Army of the Republic, and I felt greatly at home with him and his good wife at their home nestled in amongst the snow-clad hills of the Wasatch mountains about four miles from Park City.

Brother Williams is as true as steel to our cause, with an open hand and warm heart, and I was pleased to read from his pen, in the Park City papers, a most able and eloquent exposition and defense of labor against the heartless greed of monopoly, and words of wisdom to those who toil to enrich the millionaires of this world.

Our thanks are also due, at Park City, to the managers of the great and far-famed Ontario silver mine at that place, a mine which for twelve years has never levied an assessment on its stock, but paid largely straight on from the first.

Its managers and foreman are Liberals, and treated us with great courtesy, enabling us to see a thousand feet beneath the surface, and, what to us was a great and long-to-be-remembered sight, the great Cornish pumps, which lift thirteen thousand tons of water daily. And as I gazed upon such a triumph of the intellect of man, I thought: Compared with science, what has theology done in retarding the mighty forces which flow out from mental freedom?

This mine stands at the head for richness of return, and has material to last twenty years in sight. And many thanks for the rich specimens of silver-bearing rock—some of which yields as high as $5,300 to the ton—for my cabinet.

Park City is a lively, prosperous camp, and full of Freethinkers, who gave me fine audiences on both occasions.

My last work in the territory was two lectures at Kaysville, under the auspices of that stanch defender of our faith, Hector Haight, another live man in the cause of Secular thought.

The audience may be called a success, although a rain and snow storm was raging at Kaysville—the first and only storm which hindered a large audience at any point during my campaign in Utah.

Of course, you hav heard of my farewell meeting at Salt Lake, and the invitation to return for a second campaign in January next, which I hope to do.

And in conclusion I will say that I look upon Utah as a most hopeful field of Freethought, and that should Brother C. B. Reynolds drop into Utah on his return trip he will no doubt find a warm welcome by the Liberals wherever he may chance to speak in the territory.

I am now at my home resting up a little, after which I expect to visit Oregon and Washington territory, to fan up the embers of Freethought, and look once more into the faces of old-time friends in the north. I shall go up the overland route, and shall be glad to get a line from the friends at Ashland, Eugene, Albany, Portland, Forest Grove, Astoria, Seattle, Tacoma, Port Townsend, and Victoria, before leaving my home in San José.

Not so Great a Blunder After All.

An amusing blunder—the work doubtless of a facetious compositor—appears in the last number of Notes and Queries, O'Connell once repeated an Irish song or hymn, two lines of which ran thus:

On our side is virtue and Erin;
On their's is the passion and guilt.

A writer in Notes and Queries, quoting this couplet, is made to say:

On our side is virtue and Erin;
On theirs is the parson and guilt.

What will pious people say to this?—Pall Mall Gazette.

Hocus-Pocus.

Of the many brilliantly stupid stories told in the pages of the Holy Queer, one that came into the life of "good old Father Abraham"—it was previous, however, to his being "magnified" from plain Abram—is entitled to a large slice of the conventional cake, I think. It appears that Jahveh dropped round to Abe's house one evening, and whistled his pet and chum out into the front yard, where he told him to count the stars, the night being clear and fine, presumably, and conduciv to a correct count, with no need of "returning boards."

Now, if Jahveh should whistle any of us out of the house and tell us to count the stars, we should be very apt to whistle our astonishment, and gently insinuate that he was biting off for us more than we could chew, as it were; in other words, that he was oversizing the possibilities in our case; but not in the least did it faze Abe, who went to work at once—it isn't at all likely that he hesitated to undertake the stupendous job who didn't hesitate to obey the divine command when Jahveh "tempted" him to murder Ike, is it?—but must hav slipped up, failing to keep tally, somewhere in the billions, as Jahveh broke in on him, telling him that as multitudinous as were said stars, so should his (Abe's) seed be, which no doubt tickled Abe, he very likely wanting to start in on the count again, naturally enough, of course.

Then Jahveh informs Abe that he is the Lord that brought him out of Ur—I suppose this means reach, or something of the sort—of the Chaldees, to giv him the land he was then in to inherit it. Now, Abe may hav known that he was indebted to his august visitor for said "bringing out of Ur," but if he did he made no acknowledgment, and returned no thanks for said "bringing out;" and infinitly worse than this cold, clammy silence was the expressed doubt of Jahveh's sincerity contained in his query, "Whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?" Think of this, reader, as coming from a mortal to whom Jahveh had just said he should inherit the land! Why, it is a wonder that Jahveh had not "waxed wroth" and, on the spur of the moment, knocked Abe out at one fell swoop, as it were, straight from the shoulder! But Jahveh was not the sensitiv plant he usually was, on that evening, for he immediately gave Abe the following remarkable recipe, which, when the mystic philter or charm had been compounded or worked, would satisfy Abe of the inheritance, presumably:

"Take me a heifer of three years old, and a she-goat [no billy goat, please observe] of three years old, and a ram of three years old [why were an old ram and a billy goat scorned, I wonder?] and a turtle-dove, and a young pigeon"—turtle-doves, I presume, were neither old nor young, age here not being mentioned.

This was the astonishing recipe, or satisfying formula, that Jahveh gave Abe, the latter proceeding at once to "take" the ingredients, as commanded—of course, you understand that he didn't "take" the heifer-goat-ram-dove-pigeon prescription as one "takes" pills and powders—and, furthermore, seeming to understand what was expected of him, "divided them in the midst, and laid each piece one against another; but the birds divided he not"—why not, we never shall know. After this mystic ceremony, Abe was kept busy driving away the fowls—buzzards, probably—which swooped down upon the carcasses, as the Holy Queer informs us. But this leads us to remark that buzzards, or carrion birds in general, do not fly by night, and we know it was night, or Jahveh wouldn't hav whistled Abe out of the house to count the stars. This discrepancy is nothing if not flabbergasting. But hold on, the next verse makes it all right for the buzzards.

"And when the sun was going down—" ah, ha! it's all right about the buzzards, you see—but, oh, ho! what about the star-counting bee in broad daylight? Whew! that's a corker, isn't it? Well, now, the stars or the buzzards hav got to go. If the stars were out the buzzards were in, if the buzzards were out the stars were in, and in view of what follows we must knock the stars out by putting them in, for we are told that "when the sun was going down a deep sleep fell upon Abram; and lo, a horror of great darkness fell upon him," which fall, my countrymen, would not hav occurred at night, probably, as the natural darkness, minus the "horror," would hav gently gathered Abraham in, don't you know, with no buzzards to keep him on the jump. Great as is the beauty of the stars, when brightly gleaming in the azure vault, they must make way for the buzzards, reader, for it was broad day when this ram-heifer-goat—she-goat, remember—hocus-pocus took place, else how, later on, could the sun be going down?

The verse immediately following opens out thusly: "And he said unto Abram"—— Right on the threshold of this verse we are forced to pause and inquire, Who said unto Abram? That which we read of immediately previous was the "horror of the great darkness that fell upon Abram;" and then we go on to read as above, leading us to suppose that said "horror of great darkness" "said unto Abram." Could it hav been that? Well, if context in composition is worth five cents on a dollar, then it was the "horror of great darkness" that "said unto Abram!" If not that, then must we fly to guesswork and be content. Well, never mind; the What-was-it or Who-was-it told Abram that his seed should be a stranger in a strange land, and serve the seed of said land four hundred years, which information must hav been a stunner for Abram, who must hav wanted to kick himself for killing the heifer, she-goat, ram, and birds, as a means to the end of satisfying himself concerning his promised inheritance! However, the Who-was-it let him down easy in the next verse, by saying, "And thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age." This was all the followers of Jahveh got in those days—a promis of burial in a good old age! Heaven, with everlasting life hereafter, was an afterthought of Jahveh's, it would appear. Wonder if it worked on the ex post facto plan, and scooped all those patriarchs, and other solid Muldoons?

Failing to see where Abram got any satisfaction out of that "horror of great darkness," beyond a promis from Who-was-it that he should be buried in a good old age, let us see if the ram, she-goat, and heifer hocus-pocus comes to a head on the inheritance question. Ah! here we hav an account, in the next verse but one, of a most strange, weird, and uncanny performance on the part of a furnace and lamp, which seems to be the quintessence of said hocus-pocus, if not, indeed, entitled to carry the banner as the very embodiment thereof. Here is the account as it appears in Gen. xv, 17:

"And it came to pass, that when the sun went down, and it was dark"—it would appear from this that the "horror of great darkness" was a private affair of Abe's, all unto himself alone belonging—"behold a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp that passed between those pieces"—presumably "those pieces" of heifer, ram, and she-goat, as no other "pieces" are alluded to in the chapter. That's all there is of the account, reader, and well and enough, as it leaves a hole as wide as a barn-door for imagination to get in. Ha! I can see that "smoking furnace and burning lamp" spooking along "between those pieces"—of course, they had to separate them, as Abe had carefully laid them together, after splitting the carcasses; but a smoking lamp and burning furnace that could gallivant about between sides of beef and mutton could easily separate said sides—and waltzing about the turtle-dove and young pigeon—see 'em now, can't you, reader? If you can't, your fancy must hav been brought up by hand on a cold tripe regimen!

"Yes, indeedy, see, can I, that smoking furnace belch its lurid fumes, as old Vesuvius belches forth its sulphurous vapor, when on the belch and furious to disgorge the seething contents of its vasty, molten depths; and see the lamp, as round about the turtle-dove it goes—the pigeon, too, not mentioning the heifer, ram, and she-goat combination—flaring now and flickering, now flashing bright and flaming high, as, like the luring ignis fatuus, or jack-o'-lantern, it sweeps above the poor, poor birds in death's cold grasp! See 'em? You bet I can, no pent-up regimen of tripe, stale beer, and such like things my fancy's powers confining! Yes, yes, that all-uncanny passing of the lamp and furnace I can see, as plainly quite as though it happened yester e'en, or e'en week after next; and o'er me chills do creep and curdle stiff my blood, and goose-flesh, with its horrid feel, possession of my epidermis takes! Too much, too much—hence, horrible spookies! unreal mockeries, hence! Why, so; being gone, who's afraid?"

Now, reader, perhaps you can't see—of course you can't for the scales on your eyes—where this heifer, ram, and she-goat hocus-pocus and jack-o'-lantern business—whether Abe emerged from that "horror of great darkness" and witnessed this interesting, but uncanny and goose-flesh breeding spectacle, the H. Q. does not state—perhaps you can't see where and how this quisby and bizarre performance got in its work for Abe's inheritance—no, of course you can't. No matter and nevertheless, it got there all the same, for immediately after the passing of the spooky lamp and furnace, Jahveh gave Abe the title-deeds to all the land between the Nile and Euphrates rivers, free gratis for nothing—a big ranch, wasn't it? No levity, hereafter, should you witness any sort of hocus-pocus not understood by you, but mentally, if not orally, exclaim, with fervent heat, Great is hocus-pocus!

I declare I am quite overcome by the effects of this most brilliant and original tale of truth and veracity, founded on beef, mutton, and goat's flesh, conduciv to goose-flesh, with the jack-o'-lantern episode, and must stop here and now. Besides, that "smoking furnace and burning lamp" are waltzing back at me, and the hour near midnight! Dear me, a too able-bodied imagination is worse than none, at midnight, sometimes, I really believe. There's a beer foundry over the way, where cold tripe wrapped in vinegar is to be had. I am going over to eat a pound or two in order to clog the wheels of my too teeming fancy. Selah!

Write to Mr. Merriman.

Everyone acquainted with the abuses of liberty worked by the United States statute known as the Comstock law should write at once to the Hon. T. A. Merriman, Washington, D. C., and urge him, as chairman of the House sub-committee on post-offices and post-roads, to report favorably upon the bill now before his committee repealing that law.

This is a duty that we earnestly hope no friend of the honest and manly founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER will neglect. Whoever lets his thoughts go back to the time when D. M. Bennett occupied a cell in a penitentiary because Comstock hates Freethinkers, will feel like tearing that law from the statute books with angry hands. The present opportunity should not be lost.

A Change of Front.

Three years ago the Presbyterian Church of England appointed a "Drafting Committee" to revise the Articles of Faith in the Confession, and to bring them more in harmony with the ideas of the present time than are the doctrins of the Westminster Confession, drawn up some two hundred and forty years ago, when the world knew a good deal less than it does now. This committee has reported to the synod, and its recommendations hav been given to the presbyteries for adoption or rejection.

The chief differences between the old Confession and the new are outlined by a correspondent of the Sun. The new begins by condensing, principally by elimination, the thirty-three chapters of the present Confession into twenty-three, and by stating the retained doctrins in less metaphysical and more easily understood language. The severity of the doctrins is also much reduced. The present Confession states that through Adam's fall the whole race is "utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposit to all good, and wholly inclined to all evil," and that for this corruption of nature the race is "bound over to the wrath of God and curse of the law, and so made subject to death, with all miseries spiritual, temporal, and eternal." It is upon this dogma, amply supported by texts of scripture, that Brown's Catechism, in common use in this country, relies for doctrinal authority for its teaching to infants that they are "enemies to God, children of Satan, and heirs of hell," and that they "cannot even cease from adding to their sin."

The new Articles of Faith put this matter in a brighter light. They place the responsibility of "original sin" on Adam and the devil. They declare that all mankind hav inherited a sinful nature, but they specially omit to say that because of this inherited sinful nature those who inherit it shall be consigned to spiritual, temporal, and eternal miseries. This elimination is one that people should be specially grateful for.

The first "point" of Calvinism, variously known as "predestination," "effectual calling," or "election," has also been revised. The Westminster Confession sets forth that "all those whom God hath predestinated unto life, and those only, he is pleased, in his appointed time, effectually to call . . . to grace and salvation by Jesus Christ. This effectual call is of God's free and special grace alone, not from anything foreseen in man. Elect infants, dying in infancy, are regenerated and saved. So also are all other elect persons who are incapable of being called by the ministry of the word. Others, not elected, never truly come to Christ, and therefore cannot be saved: much less can men not professing the Christian religion be saved in any other way whatsoever, be they never so diligent to frame their lives according to the light of nature and the law of that religion they do profess."

The new Articles are more generous, and approach Universalism, by declaring that "God willeth that all men should be saved and come to a knowledge of the truth, and that the gospel of forgivness and eternal life is freely offered to all men." They also declare that Christ came to save the world, not simply the elect, and the doctrin that God made a lot of men for the purpose of damning them is eliminated. The new Articles also dwell less emphatically upon the reward of the wicked, the "drafting committee" being content to send them into eternal punishment, without describing it as "eternal torment," "hell," or "torments and utter darkness."

In accounting for the "creation of the world," the astute theologians who compiled and manufactured the Westminster Confession declared: "It pleased God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, for the manifestation of the glory of his eternal power, wisdom, and goodness, in the beginning, to create, or make of nothing, the world and all things therein, whether visible or invisible, in the space of six days, and all very good." In declaring this as their conviction and faith, they followed, not knowing any better, the opening chapter of the Bible, which they credulously enough, as it appears now, regarded as truthful and authoritativ. The "drafting committee," however, discard the Mosaic account, and describe the "creation" in these words:

> "God was pleased in the beginning to create the heavens and earth, and through progressiv stages to fashion and order this world, giving life to every creature."

It will be noticed, of course, that this is a complete abandonment of the old version. Nothing is said of the material out of which God made the universe, or of the order in which he constructed it, or of the laws governing its phenomena. The committee simply make a statement, without intricate or embarrassing clauses, of what they think will not conflict with science, which they acknowledge as authority superior to divine revelation. The paragraph reminds us of that simple and satisfactory pronouncement found at the end of several verses describing the creation in the book which the committee reject—"And it was so." The new Article merely adds the modern improvements. What becomes of the Son and Holy Ghost under the new order, we are not informed, but no doubt the committee hav provided liberally for them in some new branch of the world-making industry.

The details of the other changes in the Westminster Confession hav not yet reached us, but they probably include a modification of the other four Calvinistic points to conform to the changes in these fundamental dogmas. The perseverance of the saints depends upon their "election," and if "effectual calling" is not so potent as has been assumed by the Presbyterians, then the dogma of "justification" goes overboard, for God justifies those only who hav been called. Discarding one root dogma necessitates, of course, a revision of all branches springing therefrom.

We congratulate the Presbyterians upon the progress they are making. By and by they may hope by industry to get within hearing distance of the scientific and philosophical thought of the world. But what a great surprise to them when they get to heaven to there find all the fellows of good works they hav imagined in hell, and to miss those like John Calvin and John Knox who were so sound in red-hot doctrin and weak in charitable doing! After all, though, who knows that the present revisers of the creed are nearer right than the mathematical divines of the Westminster Assembly?

The Brethren Stuff the Ballot-Box.

Again the Methodist delegates to the General Conference hav shown their great political ability and knowledge of the ways that are dark and tricks that are not always vain, but were so in their hands.

The fight over the election of bishops raged at the Metropolitan Opera House the major part of last week. The office is a fat one and profitable, and givs its possessor great power in the church. The friends of the candidates hav lobbied long and earnestly for their favorits, and allowed their zeal great scope. As the eighth ballot was being taken on Wednesday, Bishop Merrill stepped to the front of the platform and asked the delegates to listen to a word of warning. On the previous, or seventh ballot, he said, as well as at other balloting, there were more votes cast than there were delegates present. This, he said, was unexplainable upon any honest theory, as absentees could not vote. On one ballot, too, four hundred and fifty-nine votes were found in the box, which was in excess of the total membership of the Conference, and on calling the roll of the house immediately thereafter but four hundred and twenty-nine delegates were found to be present. This state of affairs was reprehensible, and not strictly in accord with the stern law of political morality demanded of men who should be shining guides to a sinful world.

Some of the delegates endeavored to take the sharp edge off the bishop's conclusions by asking if the tellers were men who knew how to count. Bishop Merrill replied that the tellers possessed sufficient education to count up to five hundred without an error, besides which he had the documents to show that some of the brethren were ringing in on the Conference trinitarian mathematics of three in one, a computation all right in theology, but bad in voting, which should be done Unitarianly, if he might so express himself. There were three sets of names on one ballot, which had been partially separated by the orthodox voter, who evidently thought and intended that the ballots would become units when shaken up in the box. Another trinitarian ballot had been carefully folded so as to represent but one ballot, but which by accident had remained stuck together and been detected by the tellers. It was a matter of regret that on these ballots appeared the name of J. P. Newman, though Mr. Newman was not suspected of having cast them for himself, as he at the time occupied an upper proscenium box, at considerable distance from the floor. Mr. Newman did not usually do the impossible, and things out of his reach were considered safe.

The delegates, when thus caught, were righteously indignant, and voted down a proposition that if the tellers found any more trinitarian ballots they should secretly destroy them, and thus save the good name of the Conference. A lay delegate, presumably less orthodox than the clergy, moved that such ballots be preserved and an effort made to learn who cast them. The motion was adopted, and thereafter the friends of Dr. Newman confined their efforts for their candidate to more legitimate channels.

Among other tactics of the electioneering brethren were the distribution of circulars attacking the character of candidates, and the introduction upon the floor of non-delegate wire-pullers, who buttonholed the voting delegates and sought to influence their conduct. The condition of the Conference was described by one member as feverish, and the presiding officer was compelled to rebuke the brethren for their noisy and unseemly conduct. On the whole, the election of bishops was as close an imitation of a Tammany Hall meeting of the olden times as the knowledge and opportunities of the delegates permitted. It far surpassed in noisy trickery the recent Democratic gathering to elect delegates to the presidential convention at St. Louis, and much more acrimonious feeling came to the surface.

When J. D. Shaw, the Infidel editor and lecturer, of Waco, Tex., left the Methodist pulpit for the platform of liberty, his enemies charged him with deserting the church because he was not elected a bishop. Anyone who knows the earnest but gentle honesty of Mr. Shaw's nature will laugh at such a charge, but he deemed it sufficiently serious to justify the publication of his real reasons (which were that he was no longer a Christian), and in his pamphlet he described the election of bishops. No minister, he said, who sought the office could ever get it. Electioneering would certainly spoil all chances of a candidate

The choice must be free, spontaneous, and in recognition of the fitness of the man for the place. This description may hav been truthful once, but evidently since then the times hav changed. No more brazen log-rolling has for years been seen in this city in any political convention than the Methodist Conference shows. All legitimate and many illegitimate methods hav been resorted to by the friends of candidates. Parliamentary tricks, snap rulings, points of order suddenly sprung upon the Conference by keen tacticians, lobbying in and out of season—all these usual methods for gaining desired ends hav the Methodists employed. And ballot-box stuffing, the last illegal resort of dishonest demagogs, has not been omitted. Truly, the Conference has proved what we hav so often said, that Methodists are about the most immoral of all sects. From ministerial conduct to cheating in a horse-trade, the Methodists lead the van. The most pious of the laymen are the meanest; the ablest preachers are the most unscrupulous. Mr. Shaw did not know his brethren so thoroughly as he thought he did. He should visit a general conference in New York, and become acquainted with a Methodist deacon in New England, to realize the true inwardness of Methodism and to sound the depth of petty meanness of which human nature is capable.

Historical Information.

The Christian at Work, in reviewing Mr. Gladstone's consideration of Colonel Ingersoll's religious opinions, exhibits petty spite, large ignorance, and a willingness to deceive. It says:

"Colonel Ingersoll has been exceptionally fortunate in the treatment accorded his philippics against the Christian religion. For this Mr. Ingersoll is indebted, not to his extraordinary ability, but to the enterprising conductor of the North American Review, who pays liberally for the articles, and who no doubt in turn is repaid liberally by the sales of his Review. Not only so, but by what seems to be a very remarkable rule enforced in the North American Review, Mr. Ingersoll is always given the opening and closing paper, a rejoinder not being allowed. This was especially the case when Judge Black printed his article. Mr. Ingersoll having replied, Judge Black asked the privilege of rejoinder, but this was denied by the Review editor. In the present case of Mr. Gladstone we hav in red letter the announcement in the Review that Mr. Ingersoll will follow with a reply in the June number, and, as heretofore, no doubt Mr. Ingersoll's paper will close that part of the discussion. In all this Mr. Ingersoll has been very fortunate! Whether his opponents, the defenders of Christianity, hav been treated quite fairly is another matter, upon which we will not enter."

This exhibition of temper is ridiculous, though directly in line with the sewing-circle ethics of a religious journal's sanctum. But the errors of statement are unpardonable unless it is admitted that pious editors hav no moral responsibility.

In the discussion between Colonel Ingersoll and Judge Black, Colonel Ingersoll opened at the request of Mr. Rice, editor of the Review, with a paper on the "Christian Religion," a title, by the way, not of the author's choosing. The arrangement was, as Mr. Rice explains in the World of May 25th, that Colonel Ingersoll should write an article; that some one would answer it; that he then should hav the privilege of replying; then that one, two, or three others should answer him, and that he (Colonel Ingersoll) should hav the final reply. Judge Black replied in the same issue. So far so good, and both sides had an equal show. The next step was the preparation by Colonel Ingersoll of a Rejoinder, proofs of which were sent by Mr. Rice to Judge Black with information when the rejoinder would appear and an earnest request from Mr. Rice for a Surrejoinder, to appear in the succeeding issue, as Mr. Rice deemed it inadvisable to fill the Review with the discussion of the one question. Colonel Ingersoll's rejoinder was so cutting, and so completely overwhelmed Judge Black's Reply, that the judge did not want it to stand alone, but demanded of Mr. Rice its retention in a pigeon-hole till he (Judge Black) could frame an answer to mitigate the deep damnation of his taking off. Editor Rice refused, for business reasons, to hold the Rejoinder. We may suppose that he depended upon it to increase the sale of the Review, for the public were expectantly waiting for what they instinctivly felt would be a magnificent indictment of the Bible and a squelcher of Judge Black, who had committed argumentativ and moral suicide by defending the acts of Jehovah, as recorded in the Old Testament. At any rate, Mr. Rice declined to hold the Rejoinder, and Judge Black became so angry that he refused to write upon the subject again.

When Mr. Rice learned this, he cast about for another Christian competent to continue the debate. He invited many eminent divines and laymen, one after another, but they declined. Judge Black had been so crushingly annihilated that they dreaded cross-examining Colonel Ingersoll as much as Sergeant Snubbin feared to tap Samuel Weller, in a certain celebrated legal proceeding wherein Mr. Weller was a witness. It is said, and we think with truth, that Mr. Rice went to Henry Ward Beecher and implored him to attempt the rebuilding of the Christian citadel, offering him a very large sum of money, but Mr. Beecher would not do it. "Ingersoll can not be answered," he is reported to hav said. Finally, Prof. George Fisher agreed to answer Colonel Ingersoll's rejoinder to Judge Black, if one condition could be attached. That condition was, that Colonel Ingersoll should promis not to answer him. The promis was given, and Professor Fisher closed the discussion. Of Judge Black's refusal to continue the discussion Mr. Rice writes: "It was evident that he did not wish to continue the controversy on any conditions, and, although Judge Black's ability as a lawyer and writer is disputed by none, it was the general verdict of disinterested readers that he was unequal to maintain a controversy with his more gifted opponent, and that he sought to cover his retreat by resorting to personal abuse of myself. I happen to know that Colonel Ingersoll regretted the withdrawal of Judge Black, and was ignorant of any dissatisfaction on his part until after his article had appeared. The charge that Colonel Ingersoll was afraid to meet Judge Black is palpably absurd. Without desiring to become a partisan in this discussion, I may permit myself as a spectator to suggest that it is hardly credible that any man would run away from Judge Black to cross swords with Mr. Gladstone."

Thus the Christian at Work is seen to be a deceiver. Colonel Ingersoll began the debate at the request of the editor of the Review, and without knowing who his opponent was to be, but he did not hav the closing paper. The assertion often made by religious journals, repeated in every lecture by General George Sheridan, and echoed from all the little pulpits of the country, that Colonel Ingersoll influences the conduct of the Review, is disposed of by Mr. Rice in these words:

"Colonel Ingersoll never has sought, directly or indirectly, by request or suggestion, to influence in the slightest degree the conduct of the North American Review."

In the Field-Ingersoll controversy, of which the outcome is the interposition of Mr. Gladstone, Colonel Ingersoll did not hav the opening paper. The gauntlet was thrown down by Mr. Field in "An Open Letter to Colonel Ingersoll." Each party had two articles, and there was no partiality shown by the Review editor. It is inconceivable that the Christian at Work should not recollect this, and that it makes the statements it does reveals, we think, a disposition to deceive, for the sake of a momentary gratification of spite against a heretic. These facts hav been publicly known long enough for even a religious journal to hav absorbed them. What the result of Mr. Gladstone's interference in the present instance will be, or how long the controversy will continue, we certainly do not know. We should suppose, however, that Editor Rice would find space for the two famous disputants as long as they would write for him. We understand that no other issues of the Review hav sold as numerously as those containing one of Colonel Ingersoll's articles. Mr. Rice has never been accused of being a fool.

The Grand Manan Christians.

If anyone believes that the days of rotten eggs and dirt and deadly weapons and traps for Infidel speakers are over, he will be undeceived by reading the account Mr. L. K. Washburn furnishes the Investigator of his trip Down East, a little farther east than the confines of this country. But let no one think that the Blue Nosed Sanctificationists are peculiar or alone in their summary methods of supporting the gospel. It is but a twelvemonth or two since Mr. Remsburg and Mr. Reynolds faced a howling crowd right here in New York state, and only a bare year since Colonel Ingersoll paid something over seventy-five dollars to get Mr. Reynolds clear of a New Jersey jail, after his tent had been wrecked, and his person saved from a bath in a canal by the exertions of three brave women. The exploit of the lamp-throwing Christian of the Pacific coast is fresh in the Liberal mind, recalled by his leaving for Australia with the "boodle" for a new railroad in his pockets. There is much faith yet left to the godly, and much zeal for their religion, which they are yet willing and anxious to manifest by more than words.

Among ignorant Christians the first argument against Infidelity that comes to mind is physical force applied directly and personally. With the little more intelligent Christians, law is the resort—that is, to get the police and courts to do the persecuting. Jails and fines take the place of the rack and the flame-encircled stake. This latter class comprises the great majority of church-members, and hence where once we had the Inquisition, we now get Sunday laws and legislation against blasphemy. But the spirit of intolerance in a blasphemy or Sunday law is the same old spirit. It is the arrogant attempt of those who believe one way to make others by force believe the same way, or at least conform their conduct to the narrow lines drawn by that belief. In this attempt at human unity of belief and conduct, the torture-chamber has played an important part. Millions of lives hav been sacrificed to this spirit through its means. Rotten eggs, dirt, and logs rolled across the highway are quite a descent from the old-time European weapons of faith, or even from the more modern gallows, and stocks, and cart-ends of the Puritans. But as they are the best the Christians of Grand Manan can do on their little island isolated from the resources of religion, why, we must giv them credit for their intentions. In time perhaps they will equal New Jersey in practical Christian zeal and knowledge of how to suppress Infidel lecturers.

Preaching is Labor.

Trinity church will hav to pay a thousand dollars for its imported rector, the Rev. E. Walpole Warren. Judge Wallace has decided that the bargain made with the preacher with the alliterativ name is illegal under the United States law forbidding the importation of labor under contract, and hence Mr. Warren should hav been sent back. As this was not done, Trinity is subject to the penalty in such cases made and provided.

The case has excited considerable interest, as a test of the scope of the law, which was enacted to prevent a species of slavery which had sprung up by corporations importing foreigners who were bound to labor for the importer so many years at so much per week or month. The pauper labor thus introduced killed the demand for better-paid service, and the laborers already in the country were in danger of starving through inability to find employment. The operators in mines, and labor employed in large bodies, were the chief sufferers.

It may be a little humiliating to the stylish English rector to be classed by law with the dirty Hungarians and Italians who manipulate the spade and pickax in our streets and on railways, or push coal-carts under the ground, but he should remember that he has furnished the one chance for theological speculation, at so much per speculate, to be lifted from the plane of swindling and given an equal dignity with honest labor. Ministers everywhere ought to be thankful for this, for in many minds the difference between their occupation and that of the confidence operator or fortune-teller has not heretofore been clearly apparent. They will now command the respect due to all laborious if useless callings.

We cannot, however, share the surprise of the press that a minister of the gospel should hav been subject to the law. A minister of the gospel is a professional man, like lawyers, singers, artists, and so forth. He preaches so many times, prays so many times, and does so much parochial work for so much pay. No pay, no preach. Marryings and funeral sermons extra. The Rev. E. Walpole Warren would never hav trod American soil if he had not obtained a fat situation. The ministers of the present era are not saving souls at their own expense. Let Trinity church, therefore, take some of the money it gets from the leases of land to keepers of grog-shops and houses of prostitution and pay Mr. Warren's fine.

COLONEL INGERSOLL has now achieved substantial fame. A twenty-five-foot skipjack, jib and mainsail rig, will be named after him by her owner, Simon Cummings, a heretical carpenter of this city who reads THE TRUTH SEEKER and extravagantly admires the best man in the city. Mr. Cummings expects his craft to as easily distance all boats of her size as her human cognominal distances other orators.

Letters from Friends.

ST. JOHNSBURY, VT., May 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I shall always take the best paper that man ever made, and that is the noble old TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been looking around here some for subscribers; hav found some that would take the paper if it were not for their wives. Just think of it—take a paper if it were not for their wives! Good God! what is a wife for, anyway? If I had such a wife I would go to the Feejee Islands and invite some of those bucks to dine on me right away. JOHN BELKNAP.

SAUQUOIT, N. Y., May 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The dictum of science is, Life proceeds from life, and we may go as far back and as low down in the scale of life as we please and still there is life to be accounted for; and we are driven to the unavoidable conclusion that the great fundamental principle of all forms of organized life is not a product, but a self-existent cause, manifesting itself through the evoking forces in matter, and this great central life-principle exists not outside and independent of matter and its eternal laws, but as a creating force exists in them, and is an expression of both.

J. P. SMITH.

MIDDLEBURY, IND., May 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.50 for one copy of Voltaire's "Romances" THE TRUTH SEEKER improves with every issue. The illustrations are grand. How one individual can contrive so many ways of representing and exposing the greatest of frauds ever contrived by the human intellect, the Christian religion, is a mystery to me. Some of my good, pious neighbors are shocked at the illustrations. They would not let the minister see them with THE TRUTH SEEKER for all the world. No, indeed! for he receives his bread through the same great fraud which THE TRUTH SEEKER is so successfully exposing. It is said that one-half of the human race liv by gulling the other half. There are the fish and the fishers. The minister is the fisher and, O deluded men! you are the suckers. When will your ignorance depart from you? There is an advertiser who will, for $1, giv you a method of making money without working. His answer is, "Fish for suckers like we do." It has been lately discovered that the advertiser is a Methodist minister.

Fraternally yours, ISAAC IVINS.

FREMONT, O., May 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The pope has made another advance toward universal power, this time with the British government; for who can doubt he has got his price for his condemnation of the measures of the Home Rule League? The priests hav been encouraged all this time to urge the people to the greatest outrages, until they compelled the Tory government to sue the pope to stop it. Then, for certain privileges granted to the church, he steps in and denounces the very thing he has been the original cause of—the outrages in Ireland. He conquered Bismarck by similar tactics, and will eventually make it so hot for the king of Italy that he will be forced to yield a part of Italy to the temporal rule of the church. He is keeping Germany and France at daggers' points so that if he cannot gain his points in France in any other way the war with Germany will be renewed and the French republic annihilated. So by the aid of the superstition of the world he is fast gaining the universal power over all nations that the church had through the thousand years of the Dark Ages. And there seems to be no help for it until superstition givs place to reason. J. DOWNES.

STRASBURG, ILL., May 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Wednesday evening, May 2d, fifteen of our villagers visited Stewardson to hear Charles Watts lecture—subject, "Secularism and Christianity." They procured the Christian church for him. The house was well filled. I must tell you a little joke on Friend Watts. In his country "territory" is not so plenty as here, and when he wrote to me he thought Strasburg was a suburb of Chicago, just 70 miles out, "you know." When he went to get his ticket and asked the distance, they told him 194 miles. He did not get a return ticket, no doubt thinking that if the report of our Christian friends be true he would strike the place from whence no traveler ever returns. May 3d he lectured here—the same subject. Our Christian friends, in order to keep out Infidel lecturers, hav closed the schoolhouse, so we had to seek the mill. We fixed seats for about two hundred, and they were filled, a good many standing. We had a good time, with no one to molest or make us afraid. Treasurer's report: $8.40 on hand after paying all expenses.

Your correspondents all over the country furnish interesting bits of news, and words of cheer, that are a great help to their fellow-Liberals and the Editor. Report all lectures; "they do good like a medicin." If you hav a lecture and make a failure, say so, and we will all help you out by sending papers and leaflets. And if you are successful, say so like a man, and cheer the hearts of old men like Hacker, Beaver, and Mendum, "that hav borne the burden and heat of the day," and hav made it easy for you. A. YORK.

GRATTAN, MICH., May 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: If the age of miracles has passed, the age of wonders, and the strange things done in consequence of the blind devotion of some people to the behest of priestcraft, has not.

Garret O'Farrell, of Wyoming, a few miles from Grand Rapids, died recently, and willed his three children $5 each, and the balance of his estate to his wife, in case of her marriage or death the entire estate to be sold and the interest expended in saying masses for the benefit of his soul and hers for fifty years, at St. Andrew's church, and then the principal to revert to said church.

It seems almost impossible to believe that priestcraft can yet retain such a hold on the credulity of its devotees. Strange that such things are true, but true they are, though strange. It is also true that there still remains with some an honest belief that were it not for the Bible and the teachings of the clergy none of us would be above the lowest savages in knowledge, goodness, or any of the attributes that go to make the sum total of our boasted civilization.

It seems that these things should set all honest, intelligent people to thinking and acting for a reformation of public sentiment that shall effectually eradicate all similar ideas from the minds of our people. It would seem that, in view of such things, all who think they are Liberals should be diligent and activ in their efforts to teach people that there is a better way. Remember the saying that "history repeats itself;" and though we hav advanced far beyond the crudities and cruelties caused by priestcraft in past ages, there is yet danger that the boasted enlightenment of this nineteenth century may be followed by a thousand years of dark ages, as was the case with the civilized world when the great Roman empire fell, soon after its adoption of Christianity by the government under Constantine. CONVERSE CLOSE.

MONTE VISTA, COL., May 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Partly to comply with a request from a number of personal friends, Liberals, who take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and also to giv some general news that I think might interest Liberals at large, I send this communication. The 26th of April I landed in Monte Vista, and by some such cause as the Christian would call the will of God I fell at once into the company of Mr. C. S. Holcomb, of Shenandoah, Iowa, a genial old gentleman, and one of the prominent promoters of Liberalism in that town. We at once engaged conveyance to the ranch of W. F. Jamieson, one of our grandest champions of truth and freedom, a man with a heart as big as Mount Blanca and with the resources to defend it. But it is indeed comical to see so prominent a man, one who has been engaged in intellectual pursuits so long, now out roughing it on a brand-new farm; but he is happy, and enjoys the society of his noble and confiding wife and his flock of Langshans.

But he says that he has by no means abandoned the field of Liberalism, but intends devoting his winters to lecturing, and will go early this coming winter. I enjoyed to the fullest my visit of several days with him. I think strongly of becoming his neighbor. I hav become convinced that this is a good country for a great many kinds or classes of people, and no doubt the valley will teem with a grand population in a very few years. I cannot say what has caused it, but Liberals hav seemed to rain down here in the last few weeks. A very respectable number hav come since I did. Dr. A. W. James, of Zaleski, O., gave us a visit, and thinks well of the country and would like to come and settle, but is fearful in regard to bringing his wife here, as the altitude is too high for heart disease, with which she is threatened. I found him to be a gentleman far in the advance in Liberal lore and investigation, and with a heart characteristic of all good, independent Liberals.

I hav made the acquaintance of Mr. J. F. Lamson, Mr. A. Manson, "Old Powell"—as he says he likes to be called; and he is truly an old battering-ram, and flings irreligion at the foe to their consternation—Mr. Blake, Mr. S. D. Coffin, Mr. Radcliff, and Mr. McKinny. There are some others not afraid to speak for the cause, but I hav not as yet met them. Yes, one more—Mr. C. W. Watson, who scruples not to support with emphasis his radicalism.

Mr. Trueblood arrived yesterday, and went immediately to see the Champion of the Valley, Mr. Jamieson. He is not only a pounder of iron—and no doubt a good one, for he can pound orthodoxy in a giantlike manner—but a gentleman also. Upon his arrival he obtained an armload of mail, in it many Liberal periodicals. He tells me he receives seventeen different ones.

This will be a fine country in which to grow Liberals, so come along, Liberals, and help to down the beast. The Methodist minister in this town is about to die; prayers will not cure him. A. K. MOTT.

LEADVILLE, COL., May 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: As local papers are generally disinclined to publish comments upon such matters as herein inclosed, for obvious reasons, and as perhaps it would be adverse to conservativ policy to do so, and as I would like Freethinking Americans to see what practical results can be accomplished by the church when it enters the political arena, I would like very much to hav the following published through your paper, as I know it will be read by the independent Liberals, and, I hope, by some who are not such. I do not intend to argue pro or con upon vicious or illegal practices, but merely to show the power of the church in the political arena when emphatic dictates are issued by the priesthood.

All the border mining-camps are imbued more or less with a taste for gambling, and support their quota of the fraternity, but that the same odium that pervades the East in regard to that matter does not exist in the Western states and territories is obvious from the fact that the practice is generally indulged in, from the senator and governor to the miner and laborer. A certain reverend gentleman, lately ordered out of Butte City, Mont., on account of his extreme fanaticism, arrived in Leadville and immediately commenced a crusade against rum and gambling, and, after protesting for some time in the churches against the continued existence of these vices, which, as an expounder of moral law, I do not gainsay his right to do, proposed organizing the church into a political institution and forcing the question at the polls. Calling the other divines into consultation, they organized their committee, appointed their representativs, and carried the day. And now as to their methods of doing it. Some of the members of the churches were selected for mayor and aldermen, and the balance notified that if they did not vote for the ticket they would be recognized as vicious criminals. The holy Roman father notified his peons that he wanted every one of them to vote the church coalition ticket, and that he would see that they did, and you may be sure they obeyed, with the exception of some few Judas-like cravens who sold their dearly loved American franchise for whisky, and then swore by the cross of Christ that they had done as Father Robinson had commanded them.

Now, I will not speak of the disastrous results which hav followed the order of their elected mayor, which is shown by the absolute refusal of the banking institution to buy city warrants at any price, though their value prior to the crusade was eighty-five cents, nor of the fact that over seventy-five per cent, as attested by the county treasurer, of the county taxpayers hav signed a petition for the revocation of the order, which the mayor will not even look at, nor of other attendant results, but I comment on possible future results when the priest-ridden peons rally to the polls throughout the land to obey the dictates of the church, and the danger to American institutions. Is it not a direct violation of the implied construction given to the Constitution of the United States by the delegates assembled in Philadelphia in 1787? Will it not ultimately result in the overthrow of our form of government if religious fanaticism and intolerance are allowed to gain the ascendency? Hav not the records of the past ages, during which over ten millions of human lives were sacrificed by the church, shown to what extreme religious zeal and bigotry will go? Who doubts the probability of a repetition if the church could gain political ascendency? What American patriot has a right to disregard the demands of the Evangelical Association before Congress for the establishment of a national Sunday law suppressing railroad traffic, newspaper publication, and enforcing recognition by everyone of the Sabbath day? The bigotry of the Catholic church is most to be feared, as Catholics are the most subservient to the church dictates, even going so far as to declare that their fealty and duty is first to the holy Roman see and next to the government to which they belong, as enunciated by the pope, the infallible vicar of God. What has become of Americanism as known and understood in the past? Is there not a justification for the revival of the so-called Knownothing party? F. AMERICUS.

ODESSA, MO., April 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read the Gladstone-Huxley-Réville controversy on the Order of Creation, and while I feel loath to charge Mr. Gladstone with deliberate prevarication, I am unable to find reasons sufficient to clear my mind from the conviction that he is guilty of it. I am unable to see how a very intelligent man, a venerable man, an erudite man, having had the very best opportunities in the world for accumulating knowledge of all kinds, could find any appreciable likeness between the Mosaic and scientific order of creation. Perhaps I should conclude that he really believed that the end justifies the means, or that it could be attributed to superannuation or disease. But the masterly manner in which he bandies words precludes the conclusion. He would hav us believe that science has proved to a demonstration that the Bible order of creation is true. Why? Because the seven days spoken of in the Mosaic account of creation were long periods of time and they correspond in length and order of succession with the geological rendition. What? When Moses said evening and morning were a day, he meant periods of tens of thousands, perhaps millions, of our years, did he, Mr. Gladstone? And the earth was bringing forth vegetation and fruit thousands of years before there was any sun, moon, and stars, was it? O Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Gladstone! that is entirely too thin. And God inspired Moses to write in his book that his people must keep one of these long periods, the seventh one, whenever it occurred, as a Christian Sabbath, did he? Oh, what a long Sabbath! How long do you really think Moses meant that we should understand the Sabbath should be—now be honest—a thousand years? Christians tell me that a thousand years is a day with God. Is that so? If so, were these days of creation his kind of days? Do you think it took more or less than a thousand years to form a geological stratum? Come, now, Mr. Gladstone, we would like to know as nearly as possible, with God, Moses, and you, the exact length of a Christian Sabbath. What about the fifth verse of the second chapter of Genesis? There we find the statement that God made all the plants of the field before he put them in the ground. How does this coincide with Gen. i, 11, 12? Surely you cannot see any signs of inspiration in this. But you do think that the theories of some geologists do resemble, as to the order of creation, the account in the Bible, and that there is sufficient resemblance, in that part on the creation of the fowls, fishes, beasts of the field, and man to justify the belief that the author of Genesis was divinely inspired, notwithstanding a vast host of contending scientists hold contrary views on the matter. I cannot rid myself of the conviction that Mr. Gladstone knows that the writings of Moses are so very faulty in the main that even if he had got some things in harmony with science, it would still be a great deal more probable that it was the result of guesswork than inspiration.

In my opinion, no man knows this better than Mr. Gladstone. But Christianity in its present form suits him and his caste. It is now in the interest of the rich and powerful. There can be nothing plainer than that they hav transmuted it to suit themselvs. Primitiv Christianity was in the interest of the poor. But the millions of dollars, the numerous magnificent palaces, and the gorgeous display of fine silks, jewelry, and haughty faces in the pews can never be taken for a true representation, a true copy, of the meek and lowly Jesus, his teachings and doings. But evidently consistency, truth, and justice are not the things sought for by the ruling classes of to-day who profess to march under the banner of Christ, Moses & Co. Interest, selfish interest, is at the bottom of orthodoxy nowadays and permeates the whole system, and this is what has blurred Mr. Gladstone's eyes so as to cause him to see a very striking resemblance between Genesis and geology where there is none.

I am trying to form a club to take THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours fraternally, WM. L. WORLEY.

HEPPNER, ORE., May 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am indebted to Mr. C. L. Haskell for his well-meant effort to explain to me the fundamental principles of evolution. Possibly, in conformity with progress, the advanced minds of the day hav outgrown Darwinism, and if this is Mr. Haskell's condition, I congratulate him. In justice to myself, however, I will say that I believe the gentleman is mistaken. It is hardly probable that after having been reared in unbelief I would guess at what evolutionists believe and then attempt to refute my "wrong guessing," especially through the columns of a Liberal paper. Even if I had never heard of Darwin's "Descent of Man" or "Origin of Species," I could hardly fail to learn the gist of his theory while reading an article published in THE TRUTH SEEKER some time ago entitled, "What is Evolution?" The evolutionary idea as therein stated is briefly this: "Plants and animals hav all a natural origin from a single primitiv living creature, which was itself the product of light and heat acting on the special chemical constituents of an ancient ocean." The thought expressed in the latter part of this sentence did not emanate from the brain of Darwin. Darwin accounts for the origin of the primordial germ or germs by the miracle of creation in the following language: "There is a grandeur in this view of life, with its several powers, having been originally breathed by the creator into a few forms or into one" (Origin of Species). If it would not take up too much space, I might suggest that as the creator is generally regarded as being an immutable being it would be more in accordance with his unchangeable nature to suppose that he pursued the uniform course of creating all species as he did the first. Other evolutionists hav noticed the inconsistency, however, and hav accordingly expressed themselvs in this wise: "But a truly natural and consistent view of organisms can assume no supernatural act of creation for even those simplest original forms, but only a coming into existence by spontaneous generation" (Professor Haeckel, History of Creation). I am persuaded that Haeckel's is the more consistent view of the two, and so must hav thought the author of the article published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, who then goes on to say: "Starting from that single early form, they hav gone on developing ever since, from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, assuming ever more varied shapes, till at last they hav reached their present enormous variety of tree and shrub, and herb and seaweed, of beast and bird, and fish and creeping insect." In other words, the simple gave birth to the differentiated. Now I ask, how could this thing be, without a change in the existing law of heredity by which all things reproduce their own species?

Variations do, indeed, occur—which, by the way, are not always profitable ones—but any candid observer may see that there is a limit to these variations. It matters not how many varieties of the same species are produced, so long as the boundary line is not crossed. The transmutation theory is not in the least favored by these variations, which, on the contrary, make against it by proving that there is a limit to all things, and especially to the development hypothesis. The fact is that such a thing as a transmutation of species is positivly unknown to the scientific world. Innumerable attempts hav been made to secure cross breeds of different species of plants and animals, of which the only result worth mentioning has been the sterility of the offspring—which is another important obstacle in the way of the transmutation theory.

Geology says there never were any such confused distinctions of species as evolution asserts. Geologists generally agree that the first Florida coral reef is thirty thousand years old, and Agassiz tells that the insect which built it has not altered in the least during that period. To use his own language, "These facts furnish evidence as direct as we can obtain in any branch of physical inquiry that some, at least, of the species of animals now existing hav been in existence thirty thousand years and hav not undergone the slightest change in that period." Hugh Miller says: "The oak, the birch, the hazel, the Scotch fir, all lived in what is now Britain ere the last great depression of the land. . . . All human history is comprised in the nearer corner of the immense period they measure out; and yet from their first appearance in creation till now they hav not altered a single fiber. And such on this point is the invariable testimony of all paleontologic science, testimony so invariable that no great paleontologist was ever yet an asserter of the development hypothesis." For further testimony see Huxley as quoted in my last letter.

The theory of the survival of the fittest, which is that those creatures which are better fitted to escape enemies or to fight the battle of life will survive, while the weak ones perish, is not supported by the demonstrated facts of science. On the contrary, it is shown that those beings which from their anatomical structure ought to hav been the fittest to survive hav perished, while the weaker ones hav survived. May I ask, Why is this? Why should the giants perish and the dwarfs survive?

I am much obliged to Mr. Lyman Smith for his information regarding the laws of expansion, which, however, does not detract from the value of the testimony in favor of design in nature. As I hav before stated, science is an orderly knowledge of facts, but if the parts of nature were not arranged after a plan the knowledge of them could not be formed into a system.

For the benefit of those who hav seen fit to misunderstand me, I will repeat that I believe in a process of evolution, which, although in some respects apparently similar to, yet is by no means identical with, the development hypothesis.

From the data of the revolution of the solar bodies, gradual cooling of the earth, combustion of the sun, and retardation of the earth's motions geologists hav calculated that the earth has not been a fit place for plants and animals more than a hundred millions of years, which would necessarily cut Mr. Huxley short in the way of time.

Respectfully, MRS. H. A. RITOHEY.

JOPLIN, MO., May 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 14th an article written by an anti-free American citizen, under the caption of "Lincoln and Anti-Liquor," and over the name of John Prescott Guild. Though he says he is searching for truth, he must undoubtedly be praying not to find it.

That intemperance is a gigantic evil, no one pretends to deny. The political proportions the temperance question is assuming demand that the subject be dealt with coolly, with reason from brains that are unbiased by religion and not heated to the pitch of insanity by the fever of excitement of the Temperance Union association. The temperance workers hav been hammering away at the temperance question for nearly a century, and to-day the use and abuse of alcoholic stimulants is worse than fifty years ago, showing that the temperance work done is inadequate to the task of bettering the condition of the people in regard to the use of alcoholic beverages.

The gentleman is much mistaken when he thinks that the Prohibition principle is in accordance with the principles of a free government. But, like all other temperance reformers, he has fallen into the channel of error. He puts the bridle on the wrong end of the horse, and then wants him to go backward, whether it is congenial to his nature or not, and if he cannot be coaxed or persuaded to go, he will welcome war, if necessary, to force the quadruped to travel in an unnatural way the retrograde path, to the honor and glory of the temperance reformers, at the expense, sacrifice, and destruction of the individual rights and the liberties of the American people. Sir, when you go to interfering with the individual rights of the people, you sap the very foundation upon which this republic was erected.

The gentleman of Massachusetts is certainly very much mistaken when he says that it was drunken legislation that hatched secession. Notwithstanding I was on the opposit side, and fought three years in the Federal army to help put down the Rebellion, yet I hav the fairness to say that when Jeff Davis and the other representativs of the Southern states stood upon the floor of the American Congress and refused any and all terms but secession, they were not drunk. Whisky had nothing to do with the matter. They were only acting in accordance with the premeditated plan for the Southern states to cut loose from the United States and form a government of their own, the chief corner-stone of which should be human slavery. To say that these men were a set of drunken legislators is unjust and an insult to the memories of these men, and is only a dodge to prejudice the minds of the people and gain votes for Prohibition.

Where and by whom was Prohibition hatched? The egg was laid in the pulpit, hatched by the church, and the chick, fed and nourished by the Temperance Union association, is now a full-grown bird having both feathers and scales, whose friends are trying to perch it upon the top of the American flagstaff in place of the American eagle.

The sentence stating that human slavery is a mere mouse beside intemperance must hav been uttered by a man intoxicated with holy water seasoned with salvation oil direct from the throne of Christian grace. The statement that intemperance is more destructiv than war, famin, and pestilence is one of those pulpit temperance lies. It is so willfully false that even the small school-children who read history know it to be a willful falsehood. It is a strange thing that any person of ordinary intelligence would utter such a sentence for truth. I challenge the gentleman to cite to us one instance where the intemperate use of alcohol ever caused as much loss of human life, pain and suffering from wounds, as even one general engagement did in the late civil war in this country. Was it drunkenness that caused John Calvin and those hell-deserving priests to burn Servetus alive at the stake? Think of the countless millions of pains that Servetus must hav suffered during the two long hours that he was perishing in the flames! In that day the prohibition element, the prohibition movement, was the cause of this man Servetus being so brutally, so inhumanly put to death, to prohibit him and deter others from speaking their honest thoughts, thus throttling the individual rights and liberties of the people. This was prohibition for you in substance and fact.

Judging from the main tenor of the temperance literature, the temperance reformers, as a rule, hav but one idea in their heads at a time, and that is, whisky, whisky, whisky; never mentioning any other form of intemperance, when the facts are that there are more untimely graves filled, ten to one, by intemperance in eating and dress than from the use of alcoholic stimulants. Take one of your church festivals, if you please, where the participants stay up to a late hour of the night, filling their stomachs with indigestible substances, the ladies on the occasion being so tightly laced that their lungs cannot be more than half filled with air. Thus, from the retention of carbonic acid gas in the system, from an insufficient amount of oxygen, together with the gas caused from the fermentation of the undigested substances in the stomach, the blood is poisoned, the powers of life are crippled, and the offspring robbed of their longevity. This class of intemperance is never mentioned by the temperance reformers. Why? Because this intemperance is practiced for the purpose of making money to feed and clothe an ecclesiastical gentleman—a man who has locked his brains against investigation; one who utterly refuses to accept reason as a guide; one who thinks it a crime to be happy and mirthful on Sunday; one who is a vampire on the community where he livs; who is a consumer and a non-producer, even of the truth; one who has insulted the American flag, by insisting that the national birthday should be celebrated on Saturday or Monday when the Fourth of July happens to come on Sunday, thus placing the cross above the American flag, a custom that every true American citizen should denounce.

More than this, these ecclesiastical gentlemen are trying to hav laws enacted that will put their God in the Constitution and a padlock on the mouths of the people, while they carry the keys in their pockets, so they can dictate what the people may drink—a set of men who cherish a fiction more than a fact, and therefore are not capable of inditing any laws for the mutual benefit and protection of the people at large.

What has whisky Prohibition done in the United States for the past twenty-five years? It has robbed the poor man and put money in the pockets of the rich. It placed the manufacturing of whisky in the hands of monopoly, and forced the poor of the country to pay at the rate of from $8 to $16 per gallon for whisky that is fit for medical use. To-day every man that fought in the United States army for $13 per month has to pay the government a tax of ninety cents on the gallon for all the whisky that he may happen to hav need of for the actual comforts of life. Such a state of affairs, with the surplus that is now in the treasury, is an outrage on common justice. Not satisfied with thus robbing the laboring class of the people, these temperance ranters want more stringent laws of Prohibition enacted, whereby they can place the whisky in the hands of another monopoly, viz., that of the druggist, and make the physicians of the country the mediators between the druggist and the people, thus placing the people at the mercy of the doctors and druggists. This is benefiting the people with a vengeance! As this government was intended by our forefathers to be a government of the people, for the people, and by the people, I say that it is high time that the people should demand that the Congress of these United States shall take the tax off whisky and tobacco, and allow them to be manufactured as any other commodity of trade. Then we would hav competition in the manufacturing of them, and the poor man could get a little whisky for medical purposes that was fit for use without robbing his family to pay for it.

The resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution which shall prohibit the manufacturing, importation, exportation, and transportation of alcoholic liquors in the United States is unrepublican and undemocratic, and is a flank movement for a stepping-stone to get God in the Constitution, and finally to overthrow this republican government. It should be met and set down upon by every free American citizen, irrespectiv of party politics.

Just so long as this race of people hav the taste for alcoholic stimulants, just so long whisky will be manufactured and drunk, no matter what laws may be enacted against it. This being the case, we deem it nothing but a matter of courtesy to inform the Temperance Union association that the only way for them to get out of their perplexed temperance muddle is for them all to unite in prayer, and hew and set at the throne of grace, like a ram at a gate-post, until they induce their God to create another Adam and Eve, and start a new race of people to take our place that will hav no natural taste for whisky.

As a matter of fact, take the United States over and there is not more than one man out of every hundred that is a habitual drunkard. This being the case, is it any good reason that the ninety-nine out of every hundred should be debarred from the use of whisky because there is one in a hundred that is a dipsomaniac? You might just as well say, because Mr. Brown gorged himself on boiled cabbage, because he was naturally fond of it, and came near dying with cramp colic from the effect, that cabbages are unfit for food, and the growing and eating of them should be prohibited by law. The Prohibition laws that are now sought to be enacted by the influence of hypocritical ecclesiastical gentlemen are contrary to the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States, because they abolish in part our rights to liberty and the pursuit of happiness, the very things that the Constitution intended to secure to every American citizen.

I say emphatically that the Prohibition law is sumptuary law in its worst form. Why? Because alcohol is food. In its proper place it is the food of all foods. Why, when the stomach is sickened from disease, and assimilation is completely suspended, the flesh of the body being fast burnt up by the rapid oxydization of the blood and tissues, alcoholic stimulant steps in as master of the situation; it stimulates the nervous centers already exhausted; by its rapid diffusibility it enters the red blood corpuscles, staying the rapid waste of tissue. It also stimulates the capillary blood-vessels to contract on their contents, prevents capillary stasis, and reduces temperature, greatly to the relief of suffering humanity.

Alcohol is the spirit or life power of the vegetable world. In case of extreme debility, it unites with the fast-flickering sparks of human life, and by its scientific use the father or mother, as the case may be, is restored to the family, that otherwise would hav died without the aid of the alcoholic stimulants.

Can our pulpit ranters and Bible-pounders say with truth as much for Christian grace, prayer, and salvation oil? I say No. Alcoholic stimulants hav in my hands at the bedside saved more lives than the abuse of it ever destroyed in the country where I hav lived. Alcohol is one of the substances that go to make up this vast universe; without it the universe would not be complete; hence to talk about abolishing its manufacture and use is the worst kind of stupidity.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

"All Is Grist That Comes to the Mill."

BY OUR DYSPEPTIC CONTRIBUTOR.

The farmer stood in his field one day
And looked at his stacks of wheat;
"There's enough when made into bread," thought he,
"For a thousand souls to eat.
So 'twill be no sin, if I slyly mix in
A little cheat, just to temper the wheat.
It will all be grist
When it goes to the mill,"
Quoth he!

The miller sat in his dusty tower
And gazed at the bins full of grain,
That the honest farmer had toiled so hard
To harvest before the rain.
And he saw the wheels and the busy reels,
But was blind to the dust and cheat and rust.
"All is grist, I am sure,
That comes to my mill,"
Quoth he!

The grocer looks at the sacks of flour.
"Aha!" says he, "but 'tis fine!
A little of this should go a great way,
And with chalk it will nicely combine."
So in goes the chalk—"How people would talk
If they only knew all the grocers do!
But all is grist
That comes to my mill,"
Quoth he!

The baker is up to his elbows in dough,
It is flaky and light as a feather;
He has put in some yeast and alum, you know,
And smiles as he works them together.
His loaves are too light, but that is all right,
He will add on a cent, but the buyer's content.
"All is grist, as I say,
That comes to my mill,"
Quoth he!

But the innocent stomach rebels
When the mixture comes sliding in
And chalk, cheat, rust, alum, and flour
Meet again in a smaller bin.
"I'm sure it's no fun! I'm entirely undone!
Unlucky the day when that stuff came my way,
For I don't like the grist
That comes to my mill."
Quoth he!

Biographical.

ETHAN ALLEN.

Among the pioneers of liberty and justice, renowned for all time, the name of the subject of this sketch stands forth in bright and glowing colors.

Ethan Allen was a brave and independent thinker, writer, and doer. A true lover of his country and his race, he was of benefit to both, and by his life made the world brighter and better.

He was born in Connecticut in 1739. When he was twenty-four years old he went with his four brothers to Vermont, and settled there in the town of Bennington. His firm character and keen perceptions were early recognized in a dispute between the colonies of New York and New Hampshire relativ to the boundary lines of Vermont, and he was made colonel of a force of men organized to resist the invasion upon the land of the settlers by New York people. The governor of New York (Tryon) at one time offered a reward of £150 for his arrest.

"The gods of the valleys are not the gods of the hills," declared Colonel Allen, and he boldly defied the authority of the gods of New York.

He was one of the greatest heroes of the war of the Revolution, and won a great victory for the colonies before their independence was declared.

At Fort Ticonderoga he stood at the head of his eighty-three men right under the British guns. Turning to his brave followers, he said: "Now, my boys, I am going to lead you forward. It is a desperate attempt. I don't wish to urge any man against his will. Those who will go with me, poise firelock!"

In an instant every firelock was poised.

"Onward, my brave boys!" said Colonel Allen, and away they went, and before the officer in command of the British knew it—for it was early in the morning, before daylight, I believe—he had formed his men inside the fort, and rushing in upon the half dressed Gen. De la Place, who stood shaking and shivering, he demanded the immediate surrender of the fort.

"In whose name do you demand it?" stammered the now thoroughly awakened and frightened De la Place.

Independence of the colonies had not then been declared, and for a moment Colonel Allen might hav been somewhat puzzled for a suitable answer. But he spoke up loudly and bravely, "I demand it in the name of the great Jehovah and the Continental Congress!"

The British officer, of course, did not know much about the authority of the Continental Congress, but he was afraid of the "great Jehovah," and he thought, it is said, that if Jehovah had sent that big, burly fellow at that early hour in the morning to take the fort there was nothing else to do but to let him hav it, and he accordingly did so. After securing that point, Colonel Allen and his brave men went off the very same day and took Crown Point and the one vessel that belonged to the king on Lake Champlain.

That was a great day for Colonel Allen and his followers, and also for our country. A writer has truly said, "This was the first conquest our country ever presumed to call for herself, and this the first acceptable offering upon the altar of liberty by our country, at which, may it never be forgotten, Ethan Allen officiated as high priest."

This great soldier was conspicuous during the seven years of war that followed. He was once captured by the enemy and sent a prisoner to England, and nearly the whole time of his captivity he was treated as a felon and kept in irons. He was tempted, but never swerved from duty, and maintained his integrity to the last.

After the war he took up land in Colchester, Vt., and worked hard to make his farm a handsome and thrifty one. He had no respect for the religion of the times or the various creeds. His faith was of the Thomas Paine order, but his wife was a zealous devotee, and delighted in entertaining ministers; and they, although they were perfectly well aware of Colonel Allen's views, never hesitated to accept his generous hospitality, for there they were entertained upon "the fat of the land."

They used to hav meetings sometimes in Colonel Allen's house to please Mrs. Allen, but the colonel's motto was, "Short prayers and long puddings!" He gave liberally, whenever solicited, toward the support of the gospel, although he had no faith in it.

There is a story about an elder named Aminidab Robinson, who was in the habit of frequently "putting up" at the colonel's house, and who took it into his head to try and convert the colonel.

In reply to the elder Colonel Allen is reported as saying: "You had better not spend your breath praying for me, for my god will not think the better of you for so doing, and, as for myself, take my word for it, I never shall be whittled down to such a sharp point of meanness and misanthropy as to join a church, by any power on earth, or anywhere else. I fought for liberty and equality as to the rights of my whole countrymen, not a part. He that well does well is, and God's parental goodness extends to all his children."

The elder had supposed the colonel was an Atheist, but he assured him that he believed in a higher power, and had no doubt it was with him when he captured Crown Point and Old Tye.

"But," said the elder, "we read that God is a God of peace and not of war."

"So am I a man of peace, in time of peace," said Colonel Allen, "but not in war. God drove Satan out of heaven, it is said, after a tough battle which closed the rebellion, and if it was not out of compassion for the ministers, or, in other words, the half and whole pay officers in the army of the saints, I should wish the Lord had served that old rebel Beelzebub as Washington would hav done Arnold if he had caught him. I hav a poor opinion of these peace folks in war, and war folks in peace."

The two talked long upon the subject of religion, and finally the elder asked Colonel Allen to giv him his views upon heaven, etc., which he very kindly did in these words:

"Well, we'll take Mr. B., the Congregational minister, Elder C. of the Methodists, and yourself, and myself for examples. We all get up to heaven's gate together, somehow, and rap. A voice from within cries, 'Who's there?' The two ministers, after some words as to which should be first, finally giv the preference to the Presbyterian, who says, 'Rev. Mr. B, of the Congregational church.' 'Look and see if his name is on the books.' The answer is, 'Yes; the charge against him for great hypocrisy and selfishness is balanced by a fever and repentance before he died. Let him enter.' The impatient Methodist next announces himself as Elder C. of the Methodist Episcopal church of ——. A long account of nameless improprieties is found against him, but as he sincerely repented, he is let in and located. The next one to enter is Elder Aminidab Robinson, pastor of the Especial Calvinist Baptist church, etc. His name is found, and also that his meeting-house was built by old Ethan Allen, the American patriot who was called an Infidel. He can enter. Ariel is then instructed to conduct Mr. Robinson to his people and lock them in together, for as they hold to close communion on earth so they must in heaven."

"And how are you to get in?" asked the elder, somewhat ruffled.

"Well, when my body and soul settle up and dissolve their temporal copartnership, the body will go to its parent earth and my soul will start off on its own hook, carrying no church certificates or commissions. Not a minister or deacon will go with me; they will strive to accompany my wife. Perhaps I may hav the company of one of my old comrades of the war. When we arrive at the gate I will rap loudly, and 'Who's there?' will sound out upon the air. I shall respond, 'It is old Ethan Allen, that took Tye, Crown Point, and the armed vessel on the lake without any orders but yours, all in one day!' A voice will be heard, 'Ah! yes, you need not look in the books, for the brave Allen has credit on every page of them; open the gate to him and all his comrades, for he would never be seen in bad company.' So in we go, and the deputy grand master will say, 'Colonel Allen, in the name of the majesty of heaven, I bid you and your friend there welcome to paradise; you hav contributed as far as you could to the happiness, and indiscriminately, of all his creatures; and, as you were kind to all, and identified yourself with no creed or sect on earth, so shall there be no bounds set for you in heaven. All will be happy to see and welcome you. Go where you please, and when you want to see your old friend Aminidab Robinson Ariel will unlock the door and let you in among the Calvinists, and out, when you hav tarried long enough.'"

The elder did not attempt to convert Colonel Allen after that. This brave man was what is termed a Deist, as was Thomas Paine. He was true to all his convictions, and had no respect for cant or useless ceremonies. He wrote several political pamphlets, and was also the author of a book entitled, "Reason the Only Oracle of Man," in which he makes short work of the Bible and popular Christianity.

There was a story circulated after his death in which it was made to appear that he told one of his daughters to follow the religion of her mother. This has been clearly contradicted by a descendant of Colonel Allen. He died as he lived, a brave, true-hearted, respected man, who had no faith or fellowship with error or superstition in any form.

Correspondence.

Roanoke, Tex., May 12, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: As I never hav seen any correspondence from this place, I thought I would write. I am twelve years of age. Papa has taken The Truth Seeker ever since I can remember. There was a "hardshell" Baptist preacher preached at our schoolhouse last Sunday. I could hav gone, but I did not think I could learn anything. I hav a little brother three years of age; his name is Bruno. He is so mischievous—if he keeps on until he is grown. I expect he will be burnt like the other Bruno. I hav a little niece four years of age; her name is Susan E. Hogan. Pa named her after you. I will close for this time. Your little Freethinker friend,

Ora G. Graham.

Dresden, Ind., May 15, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: As this is my first letter, I will not stay long. J. E. Remsburg has just been here and delivered four lectures. He gave three in the Owensburgh hall and one at Dresden in the school-house. I went every time, and we thought he was a splendid speaker. Pa takes The Truth Seeker, and we hav good times looking at Heston's pictures. I think the picture on the front page of The Truth Seeker of May 12, 1888, corresponds with the people pretty well out here, for I think the preachers hav the wool pulled over their eyes so that they lead very well. They hav got the people stuffed so full of prejudice that some of them would not come out to hear Mr. Remsburg lecture. The Baptist preacher would not let bis boys go to hear him; they said they would like to go, and he told them it would exert bad influence in the community if they went to hear such a man as Mr. Remsburg. But all that went to hear him thought he was a nice speaker, and some of the people that did not go wished they had gone; but it was too late to wish after he had left.

You will please find inclosed twenty-five cents for Mr. Hacker.

Wishing success to the Corner, I remain,
Your Liberal friend,

Mary Ashcraft (aged fifteen).

Prairie City, Ore., May 11, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: As I hav never seen a letter from this part of the world, I thought I would write a few lines. We liv in a beautiful little valley in eastern Oregon. We hav a good public school where liberal education is taught. Public schools are more plentiful than churches. Chances of education are reasonably good. The people are Liberal. My father has taken The Truth Seeker for several years. I like to read the Children's Corner and the letters from the boys and girls. I like to look at the pictures—some of them are very good and instructiv. This is my first letter to a paper, and if it is worth printing, I will write again some time.

Yours truly,

Mary M. Davis (aged fourteen).

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

Poetry.

"Blasphemy."

"Blasphemy!" What's "blasphemy" but a word,
A term that signifieth much or naught,
According to the peoples of the earth?
'Tis here, 'tis there, all round about in spots,
Alike in no two sections of the globe.
What's "blasphemy" with us in Christendom
Would make us solid with the pious Turk—
With "Allah," too, and don't forget it, you!
In Hindoo-land, I'm not quite cert 'twould not Entitle us to move in highest "caste,"
And win great "Brahma's" most approving winks!
In Dragon-land, the home of Tee To Tum,
'Twould gain for us a pigtail on the jump,
"Joss" broadly grinning full from ear to ear!
But unto him who Allah doth "blaspheme,"
Great Buddha, Brahma, Joss, and all the rest,
We say, "O bully boy with the glass eye!
Thou'st struck it rich and rare, for thou art saved!"
Of latitude and longitude the sport,
Chameleon-like it changes color with
The change of base; so much for "blasphemy!"
Our home-brewed article is dread and dark—
In Boonton, Jersey, black as Erebus—
But ta'en abroad becomes as white as snow!
As saith the stanch and brilliant Ingersoll,
That human gem of purest ray serene,
"'Tis but a question of geography!"

A Basket of Clubs.

BIBLE BROWSE.

Dr. Ladd has told us all about the Bible. How it was not all written by those persons to whom it is attributed; how it has some over-steep stories; how its dates don't jibe; how miserable are some of its morals; and yet how it contains, by inspiration, the word of God! Who is to tell us which from t'other? Why, Dr. Ladd, of course. The North American Review says upon it: "If we must prune away old beliefs, it does not follow that we must cut down to the roots and tear up and destroy that which is essential and vital to belief." I ask, What good is the stump of belief when the boughs are stripped? Does the Review write in the interest of reason, or does it still love to browse on the rotten cabbage-leaves of theology? Perhaps that ensilage of Gladstone's flabbergasted its wits. An Ingersoll pill may settle its hash until it finds some more such indigestible fodder. How is it that such pretentious periodicals as the North American Review, the Forum, and the Popular Science Monthly complain of the surfeit of good manuscript, and yet pad out their pages with so much miserable trash? Can't we hav one genuin scientific and philosophical publication in the country, or must truth eternally take its hat off to a lie in order to pass?

THE SUREST SALVATION.

The Boston Advertiser is often anathematized as a "Puritan sheet," but the Puritans would turn over in their graves to damn it if they could read this sentence quoted from a recent copy: "Probably the laws of temperance, justice, and industry are the best salvation." That puts a big discount on the church route to glory. Would it not, then, be good policy to take the taxes off farms and mills and put them on meeting-houses and minister-factories?

CIVILIZATION VS. CHRISTIANITY.

Matthew Arnold, in his dying essay, defined civilization as "the humanization of man in society, the satisfaction for him in society of the true law of human nature." That knocks Christianity out; for, according to Christianity, human nature is all wrong and nothing is satisfactory about it, and especially execrable is society. If civilization humanizes man—satisfies him among his fellow-men with the true law of human nature—what more, then, can be desired? Nothing logically conceivable, and therefore Christianity must be superfluous—a mushroom or a nightmare. I will take the essay of Matthew, whose surname was Arnold, and bounce the gospel of Matthew, whose surname is dubious, and believe I hav made a brilliant swap.

GOSPEL GLAMOR.

Sir William Hunter claims that converts to Christianity are not often made in India from Islam and Buddhism, but come from the inferior races of various nondescript religions. He givs some praise to Islam and Buddhism for their intellectual and moral cult, and shows some respect to the Vedas as a text of the inspiration of antiquity which does not sanction the abominable customs and absurd notions imposed on the ignorant; crediting Christianity, however, with being a force which elevates the low caste and no caste Hindoo by inculcating the ideas of the brotherhood of man and the sisterhood of woman. Whilst we may admit that in a certain degree Christianity, in some of its phases, may do this, yet we insist that it has purloined from Secular philosophy every part of its system—to stretch the word system—which can in any way do man any good. A religion whose fundamentals are a revengeful God, a howling hell, an infinit devil, and a totally depraved humanity can, so far as itself goes, only influence ignorance into deeper degradation. The same author is obliged to own that Islam and Buddhism are strict temperance institutions, and to regret that it is mostly among the servants of Christians—imitating their masters—that inebriety is noticeable among the Hindoos.

THE COST OF DAMNING A SOUL.

Some go on by Adams's Express,
And some put their trust in Fargo.
If you want to go to the devil direct,
Then get yourself booked at Chicago.

Secular Union Secretary Stevens has figured down fine the cost of saving souls in the ungodly city of Chicago. I would now like to hav him secure the statistics of the debit for damning souls and bodies both, in that peculiar place, and let us see how the amounts will compare.

I do not know how it is that Freethinkers are so frequently growling at the expense of the "gospel," when it only remotely affects them, and in a relativly minor amount, whilst yet they glory in standing as political godfathers to that infamous child of perversity, the liquor traffic, which is a direct tax of maximum proportions on both man and merchandise.

The United States sports an army of upward of sixty thousand drunkards who march into their graves every year, or one thousand to each one million population. If one in every thousand of our population was solemnly sacrificed each and every year on the altars of worship, what an outcry there would be! But as they are legally butchered and robbed in the line of business, the curse is condoned as a matter of course. But more than this, the shortening of life of more or less moderate, and of more and more immoderate, drinkers is ten times as great in the aggregate. The mortality thus told in the ranks of rum and its allies keeps pace with perennial war. The money cost of all this curse also equals war's account. How many go mad by this misery, is another item of interest. Religion has a large showing on the lunatic ledger, but rum has a larger list, being about one-half the total, and may justly claim no small share of those who are reckoned on religion's tally. The prisons possess their population from the gin-mills and beerswills; add to their expense the cost of courts, and the cost of criminals' and drunkards' lost time, and you hav some elements of the problem; but the headaches, the heartaches, the debasement and despair, that go with a soul damned by drink and a body doomed by drams no algebra can ever announce.

A SHAMEFUL SNIVEL.

What are the Secular Unionists whining for? Some of them, and no small ones, are pitifully sniveling and spitefully sputtering because the Woman Suffrage convention was captured by Christians. Well, where were the Secular Unionists when the Christians took the fort? And who commanded the Secular Union conventions, that no Woman Suffrage resolution appears among its Demands?* Secularism, as an organized force, has not had sense, honesty, and courage enough to brave the issue most prominently before reform people, and yet it whimpers behind the fence because the Christian candle shines through the cracks! Shame on the Secular Union for not turning its headlight of philosophy upon this question and making the matter as plain to the people as the harvest moon! Get out of your mud-ruts, O Secularists! and build your bonfires on the highlands of moral and political reform. Quit your meanness, and go to work, as though you meant something besides a self-admiration and general mud-slinging society. If Christians shall secure universal suffrage, temperance, and education, who will be to blame? The army that refuses to fight will hav its own ammunition fired at itself from its own guns—and be rightly served.

FIGHTING FACTS.

A piety-pedlar tendered me a tract, remarking that it was written by the great and good President Edwards, and he thought I would like it, for I looked like a Christian! I asked him if it was that bloke who said God shook sinners over hell as housewives did poisonous spiders over the kitchen fire. He didn't remember about that. I read: "I will regard the obedience, sacrifice, mediation, and intercession of Christ as the only procuring cause of all those spiritual blessings which conduce to that end: as the pardon of sin, peace with God, and the sanctifying influence of his spirit;" and observed: "I hav no use for a God who planned the murder of his own son to satisfy his wrath against those who murdered him." He said: "You don't believe the Bible, then." "No," replied I; "I am done with books; I want facts. Angry Gods are played out." "You must object to epidemics, then," he blurted. "Most certainly I do," I retorted. "We hav to hav them!" he flouted. "No, we don't," I shouted; "they come on account of ignorance and superstition, laziness and misdirection. If the money spent on churches was expended in sewers, we would hav few epidemics. Anyway, a God that would create an epidemic ought to be damned." "It is hard fighting facts," he sneered. "Yet we do fight them and beat them by science," I jeered; "whilst the church has fought them and failed, and now teaches, and claims the credit for the truth of, what it burnt and damned the discoverers for telling." The Christian is welcome to love his epidemics if he thinks them evidences of God's goodness; to sensible people, they giv the lie to that gospel. Science is staying small-pox and plague, and in time it will cause surcease of superstition and prayer. JOHN P. GUILD.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.
A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.
Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much conrage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. RATIONAL COMMUNISM.
The Present and the Future Republic of North America.
BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

THE NINE DEMANDS

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

Odds and Ends.

THE saddest words of tongue or pen: "There's too many women and not enough men!"

THE Mail and Express will never be a truly religious paper until its printers' devils are cast out.

THE more you hav to do with an Indian, the more firmly you become convinced that he is a red skin.

A VERMONT humanitarian has just patented a fly-paper skull cap, for bald-headed men to wear in church.

A BAPTIST church might do without a bell, but you would naturally suppose that at times they would need a wringer.

CHAUNCEY DEPEW coined the phrase, "Kathleen Mavourneen loans," which designates uncertain loans, that "may be for years and may be forever."

IF you want to see an expression of severe simplicity and childlike innocence in a man's face, watch him when he gets two dollars change out of a one-dollar bill.

COMMENTING upon Dr. Hammond's belief that a man can liv forever, the prince of Wales says he knows it is true of a woman. But he thinks she might at least abdicate.

COUNTRY minister (in a shocked tone of voice): "Why, my little boy, what are you fishing on Sunday for?" Little boy (disgusted with his luck): "Whales, mister; an' I never knew 'em so shy."

"Do you believe there is any such thing as luck?" asked a young man of an old bachelor. "I do. I've had proof of it." "In what way?" "I was refused by five girls when I was a young man."

A CHICAGO man has the boldness and good sense to remark that the best way to close up the saloons has never yet been tried—namely, to persuade the bugs to migrate from the dirty aqueduct water to the clean beer.

ST. PETER (the gates slightly ajar): "Who are you?" Applicant: "I'm Mr. Veritas." St. Peter: "The man who writes letters to the newspapers?" Applicant: "The same." St. Peter: "Well, you can't get in here."

WALT WHITMAN declares that "nothing is ever lost." Walt must hav had the uncommon luck never to hav sent a poem to a newspaper office, and then called upon the editor months afterward to inquire why it had not appeared in print.

A MAN went into an editor's office in Boston, Mass., one day last week, transacted his business in half a dozen words, and left without offering any advice whatever as to the conduct of the paper. At last accounts the editor was very low.

"I ADOPTED that boy," he said, with the tears running down his face. "I took him out of the workhouse when he was a lad, and I kept him and fed him for nine years, and he's paid me back by running off with my wife. Gentlemen," he continued, wiping his face, "I'll stand you a bottle of wine. You don't often meet with gratitude in this world, but a kind act is sure to bring its own reward. I've sent him a check for $500."

SOME one says that many of the poems which made the biggest hits were written while their authors were under the influence of intoxicating liquors. A great deal of poetry nowadays must be written by people addicted to the cigaret habit.

THE most eloquent champion of the women who wished to be admitted as delegates to the Methodist General Conference was Dr. Putz, who is totally deaf. While this is generous to his fair clients, it might hav been decidedly rough on the unlucky brethren who were not blessed with his infirmity.—Puck.

"MOTHER writes that she will be here to-morrow for a short visit, my dear." "Very well," he replied, and as he left the house he patted his little boy on the head kindly and said: "Bobby, didn't you ask me to buy you a tin whistle and a drum, the other day?" "Yes, pa." "Well, I will bring them to you to-night."

A YORKVILLE widower, whose wife had been the head of the family, ordered a tombstone for her and left it to the good taste of the cutter to put some comforting inscription on the marble besides the name and date. When the stone was put up he went out with the builder to see it. It looked very handsome, and across the base were the consoling words, "Thy Will Be Done." "Well," said the builder, "what do you think of it?" "First-rate in every way," was the pleased reply. "And the inscription—is that all right?" The widower gazed at it tenderly for a moment. "Well, I should smile," he said; "that's just the kind of a woman she was to a dot."

Gems of Thought.

DELLA SCALA stood among his courtiers, with mimes and buffoons making him heartily merry; when turning to Dante he said: "Is it not strange, now, that this poor fool should make himself so entertaining; while you, a wise man, sit there, day after day, and hav nothing to amuse us with at all?" Dante answered bitterly: "No, not strange; your highness is to recollect the proverb, 'Like to like;'"—given the amuser, the amusee must also be given. Such a man, with his proud, silent ways, with his sarcasms and sorrows, was not made to succeed at court.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

WE honor our ancestors when we liv better, think better, and do better than they did. That is a false veneration that builds a ship after the model of the Mayflower; that erects a house of Puritan architecture; that livs as they did in our grandfathers' days. Our forefathers showed their sense when they respected their own ideas . . life is progress; the world must be emancipated from models. Candles may be run in molds, but not human beings.—L. K. Washburn.

A MAN'S religious views depend largely on the place of his birth, his religious surroundings in childhood, the associations of his later years, his opportunities for study, as well as the intellectual and moral character—dependent on his cerebral organization—which he has derived from his parents. If he is born in Turkey he will not be likely to be a Christian. If he is born in Massachusetts or Illinois he will probably not be Mohammedan. If he has inherited religious tendencies, is surrounded in youth by religious influences, and possesses but little self-reliance or independence, he will probably retain through life the faith of his childhood. If he has a bold, inquiring mind, is disposed to examin subjects for himself, has access to works of a Liberal, philosophical, or scientific character, he will probably outgrow many of the religious errors of his early years.—B. F. Underwood.

They filled our home with glee,
Their graves are severed far and wide

Where are those dreamers now?

ONE penitent poet implores Varuna to tell him for what offense he seeks to kill his worshiper and friend, for all the sages tell him that it is Varuna that is angry with him. And he pleadingly contends that he is not an intentional culprit; he has been seduced by "wine, anger, dice, or thoughtlessness." Another begs the god that, in whatever way mortals may hav broken his laws, he will be gracious. A third admits that he, who was Varuna's friend, has offended against him, but asks that they who are guilty may not reap the fruits of their sin—concluding with this amiable hint: "Do thou, a wise God, grant protection to him who praises thee."—Amberley's Analysis of Religious Belief.

THOSE men whom Jewish and Christian idolators hav abusivly called "heathens" had much better and clearer ideas of justice and morality than are to be found in the Old Testament, so far as it is Jewish; or in the New. The answer of Solon on the question, "Which is the most perfect popular government?" has never been exceeded by any man since his time, as containing a maxim of political morality. "That," says he, "when the least injury, done to the meanest individual, is considered an insult to the whole constitution." Solon lived 500 B C.—Thomas Paine.

IT is not true that a man can believe or disbelieve what he will. But it is certain that an activ desire to find any proposition true will unconsciously tend to that result, by dismissing importunate suggestions which run counter to the belief and welcoming those which favor it. The psychological law, that we only see what interests us, and only assimilate what is adapted to our condition, causes the mind to select its evidence.—G. H. Lewes.

ILLUSIONS.—(The rest next week.)

Notes and Clippings.

It is reported from Georgetown, Brown county, Ind., that a vein of gold was discovered there last Sunday, whereupon the people who were at church when the news of the discovery arrived promptly left for the gold field, nobody but the minister remaining.

A new state is about to be added to the sisterhood of nations. Letters patent hav been granted to "the British East African Company," giving them full power to erect and maintain a government, with taxes and army. It lies north of the German East African Society, near Zanzibar, and includes some of the finest land in central Africa.

Among those who are to explore Mount Ararat are several Russians, who hav joined the expedition in order to search for relics of Noah's ark. If these enthusiasts would but make a trip through Palestine, they could find enough relics of the ark to keep a whole nation in kindling-wood for a month. The supply on Mount Ararat doubtless fell short many centuries ago.

The ups and downs of life are pathetically set forth in the following paragraph from the Star, of Covington, Ga.: "Our editor will take in the press convention at Canton this week, and probably run down to Brunswick before his return. He left in fine trim, having an extra handkerchief and a little over $1.25 in hard cash. P.S.—Since the above was put in type the Rev. Jacob Carr (colored) has managed to collect a seventy-five-cent plowing bill from the editor, and he will hardly hav as big a time as he expected."

The Catholics of Chicago recently met to consider the papal rescript concerning Irish methods of political campaigning, and passed this peppery resolution: "We respectfully recommend to the court of the Vatican the realm of England as an exhaustless field for the reformation of moral conduct, and emphatically protest against the offering up of Ireland as a vicarious sacrifice for the sins of her oppressors."

Dr. Tanner, the faster, livs in New Mexico, where he has a fifteen-hundred-acre ranch. He is connected with a foundling association, which is intended to show that the baser passions are aroused principally by the use of animal food. He is now in Indiana trying to collect forty infants to experiment with. He thinks that he can make them all good and long-lived by feeding them one meal a day of a light vegetarian diet. The doctor himself livs on one meal a day, breakfast.

The Los Angeles Porcupine says: "The Rev. James H. Hoadley, of New York, according to The Truth Seeker, desires the money spent by church charitable organizations in relieving the physical distress of the poor disbursed to ministers who shall preach to them instead of feeding them. 'What is wanted,' he says, 'is more gospel and less charity. The gospel is what the poor need to-day more than anything else.' The poor hav had the particular gospel this reverend gentleman refers to for nearly nineteen hundred years, and millions of them are as wretched, ignorant, and hungry as they hav ever been. In fact, the more gospel they get the more miserable they seem. Suppose the clergy try living on 'spiritual riches' for the next thousand years, and let the people keep their hard-earned savings for themselvs instead of squandering them to maintain the temples and priests of religion."

Walt Whitman, the poet, kept his seventieth birthday June 1st by remaining at his home, 328 Mickle street, Camden, N. J., trying to revise the proofs of his forthcoming book, "November Boughs," but his day's task was very often interrupted by friends calling to wish him many happy returns. Congratulatory letters and telegrams came to the good gray poet from almost everywhere, and many "favors" were sent him, some of which were of the most substantial kind. The poor old man—for he is poor as to this world's goods—is "badly paralyzed and immobil." His latest book of poetry, "November Boughs," is in the hands of the electrotyper, and will be issued in the fall.

The expenses of the Methodist general conference were about $2,000 a day. This covers the rental of the Metropolitan Opera House, which was increased by extra sessions from the sum of $5,500 originally agreed upon to $7,500, and the traveling expenses and hotel bills of the delegates and bishops. The entire cost of the conference was about $75,000, or $20,000 in excess of the sum provided for this purpose by the collections in the churches. The Book Concern will make up the deficiency in the form of a loan. Delegates to conferences go to the hotels selected for them, the limit of expense being $2.50 per day. However, any delegate may, if he chooses, accept $60 for the month and board where he likes. Some of the delegates to the recent conference used this privilege and made a snug little profit by putting up at five-dollar-a-week boarding-houses.

Dr. Prince of Wales, a venerable archdruid, eighty-eight years old, notable among his countrymen, has made all arrangements for the disposition of his body when the vital spark shall hav fled. He wants the body burnt, and has written out 125 sound reasons why cremation is desirable. He has chosen a spot where it is to be burnt, a historical druidical pile, and has specified the fuel to be used. In the paper containing these instructions the venerable man goes on to denounce vaccination and the wearing of stockings, and concludes with a protest against matrimony, which he thinks degrading to women.

The first instance in South Carolina of a resort to the faith cure is reported from Timmonsville, where it resulted in the death of Annette Maness, a bright girl twelve years old, the daughter of respectable, intelligent, and pious parents. Annette was stricken down with measles, which finally developed into a dangerous type of dysentery. A regular physician attended her, and soon had the disease under control. At this juncture Miss Mattie Gordon came to this vicinity lecturing on Prohibition and holiness, and claiming to be a faith healer. Miss Gordon soon induced the child to leave off the doctor's medicin and adopt the faith remedy. The mother protested, but the child, encouraged by Miss Gordon, refused to take the doctor's medicin. The disease took a firm hold, and when at length the family recalled the regular physician it was too late. When last heard from, Miss Gordon was in Charleston, conducting a "holiness" revival. The people of Timmonsville declare they will make it warm for her if she ever appears in that section again.

Extract from Ingersoll's Reply to Mr. Gladstone.

From the North American Review.

At the threshold of this Reply, it gives me pleasure to say that for your intellect and character I hav the greatest respect; and let me say further, that I shall consider your arguments, assertions, and inferences entirely apart from your personality—apart from the exalted position that you occupy in the estimation of the civilized world. I gladly acknowledge the inestimable services that you hav rendered, not only to England, but to mankind. Most men are chilled and narrowed by the snows of age; their thoughts are darkened by the approach of night. But you, for many years, hav hastened toward the light, and your mind has been "an autumn that grew the more by reaping."

Under no circumstances could I feel justified in taking advantage of the admissions that you hav made as to the "errors," the "misfeasance," the "infirmities and the perversity," of the Christian church. It is perfectly apparent that churches, being only aggregations of people, contain the prejudice, the ignorance, the vices and the virtues, of ordinary human beings. The perfect cannot be made out of the imperfect.

But there is one thing that cannot be admitted, and that is your statement that the constitution of man is in a "warped, impaired, and dislocated condition," and that "these deformities indispose men to belief." Let us examin this.

We say that a thing is "warped" that was once nearer level, flat, or straight; that it is "impaired" when it was once nearer perfect, and that it is "dislocated" when once it was united. Consequently, you hav said that at some time the human constitution was unwarped, unimpaired, and with each part working in harmony with all. You seem to believe in the degeneracy of man, and that our unfortunate race, starting at perfection, has traveled downward through all the wasted years.

It is hardly possible that our ancestors were perfect. If history proves anything, it establishes the fact that civilization was not first, and savagery afterward. Certainly the tendency of man is not now toward barbarism. There must hav been a time when language was unknown, when lips had never formed a word. That which man knows, man must hav learned. The victories of our race hav been slowly and painfully won. It is a long distance from the gibberish of the savage to the Sonnets of Shakspere—a long and weary road from the pipe of Pan to the great orchestra voiced with every tone from the glad warble of a mated bird to the hoarse thunder of the sea. The road is long that lies between the discordant cries uttered by the barbarian over the gashed body of his foe and the marvelous music of Wagner and Beethoven. It is hardly possible to conceive of the years that lie between the caves in which crouched our naked ancestors crunching the bones of wild beasts, and the home of a civilized man with its comforts, its articles of luxury and use—with its works of art, with its enriched and illuminated walls. Think of the billowed years that must hav rolled between these shores. Think of the vast distance that man has slowly groped from the dark dens and lairs of ignorance and fear to the intellectual conquests of our day.

I find in your Remarks the frequent charge that I am guilty of making assertions and leaving them to stand without the assistance of argument or fact, and it may be proper, at this particular point, to inquire how you know that there is "a divine scheme of redemption."

My objections to this "divine scheme of redemption" are, first, that there is not the slightest evidence that it is divine; second, that it is not in any sense a "scheme," human or divine; and third, that it cannot, by any possibility, result in the redemption of a human being.

It cannot be divine, because it has no foundation in the nature of things, and is not in accordance with reason. It is based on the idea that right and wrong are the expression of an arbitrary will, and not words applied to and descriptiv of acts in the light of consequences. It rests upon the absurdity called "pardon," upon the assumption that when a crime has been committed justice will be satisfied with the punishment of the innocent. One person may suffer, or reap a benefit, in consequence of the act of another, but no man can be justly punished for the crime, or justly rewarded for the virtues, of another. A "scheme" that punishes an innocent man for the vices of another can hardly be called divine. Can a murderer find justification in the agonies of his victim? There is no vicarious vice; there is no vicarious virtue. For me it is hard to understand how a just and loving being can charge one of his children with the vices, or credit him with the virtues, of another.

And why should we call anything a "divine scheme" that has been a failure from the "fall of man" until the present moment! What race, what nation, has been redeemed through the instrumentality of this "divine scheme?" Hav not the subjects of redemption been for the most part the enemies of civilization? Has not almost every valuable book since the invention of printing been denounced by the believers in the "divine scheme?" Intelligence, the development of the mind, the discoveries of science, the inventions of genius, the cultivation of the imagination through art and music, and the practice of virtue will redeem the human race. These are the saviors of mankind.

What, I pray you, is the "heavenly treasure" in the keeping of your church? Is it a belief in an infinit God? That was believed thousands of years before the serpent tempted Eve. Is it the belief in the immortality of the soul? That is far older. Is it that man should treat his neighbor as himself? That is more ancient. What is the treasure in the keeping of the church? Let me tell you. It is this: That there is but one true religion—Christianity—and that all others are false; that the prophets, and Christs, and priests of all others hav been and are impostors, or the victims of insanity; that the Bible is the one inspired book—the one authentic record of the words of God; that all men are naturally depraved, and deserve to be punished with unspeakable torments forever; that there is only one path that leads to heaven, while countless highways lead to hell; that there is only one name under heaven by which a human being can be saved; that we must believe in the Lord Jesus Christ; that this life, with its few and fleeting years, fixes the fate of man; that the few will be saved and the many forever lost. This is "the heavenly treasure" within the keeping of your church.

And this "treasure" has been guarded by the cherubim of persecution, whose flaming swords were wet for many centuries with the best and bravest blood. It has been guarded by cunning, by hypocrisy, by mendacity, by honesty, by calumniating the generous, by maligning the good, by thumbscrews and racks, by charity and love, by robbery and assassination, by poison and fire, by the virtues of the ignorant and the vices of the learned, by the violence of mobs and the whirlwinds of war, by every hope and every fear, by every cruelty and every crime, and by all there is of the wild beast in the heart of man.

With great propriety it may be asked: In the keeping of which church is this "heavenly treasure?" Did the Catholics hav it, and was it taken by Luther? Did Henry VIII. seize it, and is it now in the keeping of the Church of England? Which of the warring sects in America has this treasure; or hav we, in this country, only the "rust and canker?" Is it in an Episcopal church, that refuses to associate with a colored man for whom Christ died, and who is good enough for the society of the angelic host?

. . . . . .

I am not satisfied with your statement that "the Christian receives as alms all whatsoever he receives at all." Is it true that man deserves only punishment? Does the man who makes the world better, who works and battles for the right, and dies for the good of his fellow-men, deserve nothing but pain and anguish! Is happiness a gift or a consequence? Is heaven only a well-conducted poorhouse? Are the angels in their highest estate nothing but happy paupers? Must all the redeemed feel that they are in heaven simply because there was a miscarriage of justice? Will the lost be the only ones who will know that the right thing has been done, and will they alone appreciate the "ethical elements of religion?" Will they repeat the words that you hav quoted: "Mercy and judgment are met together; righteousness and peace hav kissed each other?" or will these words be spoken by the redeemed as they joyously contemplate the writhings of the lost?

Another instance is given of the "tumultuous method in which I conduct, not, indeed, my argument, but my case."

Dr. Field had drawn a distinction between superstition and religion, to which I replied: "You are shocked at the Hindoo mother when she givs her child to death at the supposed command of her God. What do you think of Abraham, of Jephthah? What is your opinion of Jehovah himself?"

These simple questions seem to hav excited you to an unusual degree, and you ask in words of some severity: "Whether this is the tone in which controversies ought to be carried on?" And you say that—"not only is the name of Jehovah encircled in the heart of every believer with the profoundest reverence and love, but that the Christian religion teaches, through the incarnation, a personal relation with God so lofty that it can only be approached in a deep, reverential calm." You admit that "a person who deems a given religion to be wicked, may be led onward by logical consistency to impugn in strong terms the character of the author and object of that religion," but you insist that such person is "bound by the laws of social morality and decency to consider well the terms and meaning of his indictment."

Was there any lack of "reverential calm" in my question? I gave no opinion, drew no indictment, but simply asked for the opinion of another. Was that a violation of the "laws of social morality and decency?"

It is not necessary for me to discuss this question with you. It has been settled by Jehovah himself. You probably remember the account given in 1 Kings xviii of a contest between the prophets of Baal and the prophets of Jehovah. There were four hundred and fifty prophets of the false God who endeavored to induce their deity to consume with fire from heaven the sacrifice upon his altar. According to the account, they were greatly in earnest. They certainly appeared to hav some hope of success, but the fire did not descend.

> And it came to pass at noon, that Elijah mocked them and said, Cry aloud, for he is a god; either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth and must be awaked.

Do you consider that the proper way to attack the god of another? Did not Elijah know that the name of Baal "was encircled in the heart of every believer with the profoundest reverence and love?" Did he "violate the laws of social morality and decency?"

But Jehovah and Elijah did not stop at this point. They were not satisfied with mocking the prophets of Baal, but they brought them down to the brook Kishon—four hundred and fifty of them—and there they murdered every one.

Does it appear to you that on that occasion, on the banks of the brook Kishon—"Mercy and judgment met together, and that righteousness and peace kissed each other?"

The question arises: Has everyone who reads the Old Testament the right to express his thought as to the character of Jehovah? You will admit that as he reads his mind will receive some impression, and that when he finishes the "inspired volume" he will hav some opinion as to the character of Jehovah. Has he the right to express that opinion? Is the Bible a revelation from God to man? Is it a revelation to the man who reads it, or to the man who does not read it? If to the man who reads it, has he the right to giv to others the revelation that God has given to him? If he comes to the conclusion at which you hav arrived—that Jehovah is God—has he the right to express that opinion?

If he concludes, as I hav done, that Jehovah is a myth, must he refrain from giving his honest thought? Christians do not hesitate to giv their opinion of heretics, philosophers, and Infidels. They are not restrained by the "laws of social morality and decency." They hav persecuted to the extent of their power, and their Jehovah pronounced upon unbelievers every curse capable of being expressed in the Hebrew dialect. At this moment, thousands of missionaries are attacking the gods of the heathen world, and heaping contempt on the religion of others.

But as you hav seen proper to defend Jehovah, let us for a moment examin this deity of the ancient Jews.

If you will read again Deut. xxviii, you will find how Jehovah, the compassionate, whose name is enshrined in so many hearts, threatened to use his power:

> The Lord shall smite thee with a consumption, and with a fever, and with an inflammation, and with an extreme burning, and with the sword, and with blasting and mildew. And thy heaven that is over thy head shall be brass, and the earth that is under thee shall be iron. The Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust. . . . And thy carcass shall be meat unto all fowls of the air and unto the beasts of the earth. . . . The Lord shall smite thee with madness and blindness. And thou shalt eat of the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons and thy daughters. The tender and delicate woman among you, . . her eye shall be evil . . . toward her young one and toward her children which she shall bear; for she shall eat them.

Should it be found that these curses were in fact uttered by the god of hell, and that the translators had made a mistake in attributing them to Jehovah, could you say that the sentiments expressed are inconsistent with the supposed character of the Infinit Fiend?

A nation is judged by its laws—by the punishment it inflicts. The nation that punishes ordinary offenses with death is regarded as barbarous, and the nation that tortures before it kills is denounced as savage.

What can you say of the government of Jehovah, in which death was the penalty for hundreds of offenses?—death for the expression of an honest thought—death for touching with a good intention a sacred ark—death for making hair oil—for eating shew bread—for imitating incense and perfumery?

In the history of the world a more cruel code cannot be found. Crimes seem to hav been invented to gratify a fiendish desire to shed the blood of men.

. . . . . .

Let me call your attention to a few passages in Deut. xiii:

> If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own own soul, entice thee secretly, saying Let us go and serve other gods, . . . thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him; but thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hand of all the people. And thou shalt stone him with stones, that he die.

Is it possible for you to find in the literature of this world more awful passages than these? Did ever savagery, with strange and uncouth marks, with awkward forms of beast and bird, pollute the dripping walls of caves with such commands? Are these the words of infinit mercy? When they were uttered, did "righteousness and peace kiss each other?" How can any loving man or woman "encircle the name of Jehovah"—author of these words—"with profoundest reverence and love?" Do I rebel because my "constitution is warped, impaired, and dislocated?" Is it because of "total depravity" that I denounce the brutality of Jehovah? If my heart were only good—if I loved my neighbor as myself—would I then see infinit mercy in these hideous words? Do I lack "reverential calm?"

These frightful passages, like coiled adders, were in the hearts of Jehovah's chosen people when they crucified "the Sinless Man."

Jehovah did not tell the husband to reason with his wife. She was to be answered only with death. She was to be bruised and mangled to a bleeding, shapeless mass of quivering flesh, for having breathed an honest thought.

. . . . . .

By the question I asked of Dr. Field, the intention was to show that Jephthah, when he sacrificed his daughter to Jehovah, was as much the slave of superstition as is the Hindoo mother when she throws her babe into the yellow waves of the Ganges.

It seems that this savage Jephthah was in direct communication with Jehovah at Mizpeh, and that he made a vow unto the Lord and said:

> If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into mine hands, then it shall be that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up as a burnt offering.

In the first place, it is perfectly clear that the sacrifice intended was a human sacrifice, from the words: "that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me." Some human being—wife, daughter, friend, was expected to come. According to the account, his daughter—his only daughter—his only child—came first.

If Jephthah was in communication with God, why did God allow this man to make this vow; and why did he allow the daughter that he loved to be first, and why did he keep silent and allow the vow to be kept, while flames devoured the daughter's flesh?

St. Paul is not authority. He praises Samuel, the man who hewed Agag in pieces; David, who compelled hundreds to pass under the saws and harrows of death, and many others who shed the blood of the innocent and helpless. Paul is an unsafe guide. He who commends the brutalities of the past, sows the seeds of future crimes.

If "believers are not obliged to approve of the conduct of Jephthah" are they free to condemn the conduct of Jehovah? If you will read the account you will see that the "spirit of the Lord was upon Jephthah" when he made the cruel vow. If Paul did not commend Jephthah for keeping this vow, what was the act that excited his admiration? Was it because Jephthah slew on the banks of the Jordan "forty and two thousand" of the sons of Ephraim?

In regard to Abraham, the argument is precisely the same, except that Jehovah is said to hav interfered, and allowed an animal to be slain instead.

One of the answers given by you is that "it may be allowed that the narrativ is not within our comprehension;" and for that reason you say that "it behooves us to tread cautiously in approaching it." Why cautiously?

. . . . . .

You hav taken the position that the conditions are different; and you say that: "According to the book of Genesis, Adam and Eve were placed under a law, not of consciously perceived right and wrong, but of simple obedience. The tree of which alone they were forbidden to eat was the tree of knowledge of good and evil; duty lay for them in following the command of the most high, before and until they became capable of appreciating it by an ethical standard. Their knowledge was but that of an infant who has just reached the stage at which he can comprehend that he is ordered to do this or that, but not the nature of the things so ordered."

If Adam and Eve could not "consciously perceive right and wrong," how is it possible for you to say that "duty lay for them in following the command of the most high?" How can a person "incapable of perceiving right and wrong" hav an idea of duty? You are driven to say that Adam and Eve had no moral sense. How under such circumstances could they hav the sense of guilt, or of obligation? And why should such persons be punished? And why should the whole human race become tainted by the offense of those who had no moral sense?

Another word as to Abraham. You defend his willingness to kill his son because "the estimate of human life at the time was different"—because "the position of the father in the family was different; its members were regarded as in some sense his property;" and because "there is every reason to suppose that around Abraham in the 'land of Moriah' the practice of human sacrifice as an act of religion was in full vigor."

Let us examin these three excuses. Was Jehovah justified in putting a low estimate on human life? Was he in earnest when he said "that whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed?" Did he pander to the barbarian view of the worthlessness of life? If the estimate of human life was low, what was the sacrifice worth?

Was the son the property of the father? Did Jehovah uphold this savage view? Had the father the right to sell or kill his child?

Do you defend Jehovah and Abraham because the ignorant wretches in the "land of Moriah," knowing nothing of the true God, cut the throats of their babes "as an act of religion?"

Was Jehovah led away by the example of the gods of Moriah? Do you not see that your excuses are simply the suggestions of other crimes?

You see clearly that the Hebrew mother, when she throws her babe into the Ganges at the command of her god, "sins against first principles;" but you excuse Abraham because he lived in the childhood of the race. Can Jehovah be excused because of his youth? Not satisfied with your explanation, your defenses and excuses, you take the ground that when Abraham said, "My son, God will provide a lamb for a burnt offering," he may hav "believed implicitly that a way of rescue would be found for his son." In other words, that Abraham did not believe that he would be required to shed the blood of Isaac So that, after all, the faith of Abraham consisted in "believing implicitly" that Jehovah was not in earnest.

You hav discovered a way by which, as you think, the neck of orthodoxy can escape the noose of Darwin, and in that connection you use this remarkable language:

"I should reply that the moral history of man, in its principal stream, has been distinctly an evolution from the first until now."

It is hard to see how this statemeut agrees with the one in the beginning of your Remarks, in which you speak of the human constitution in its "warped, impaired, and dislocated" condition. When you wrote that line you were certainly a theologian—a believer in the Episcopal creed—and your mind, by mere force of habit, was at that moment contemplating man as he is supposed to hav been created—perfect in every part. At that time you were endeavoring to account for the unbelief now in the world, and you did this by stating that the human constitution is "warped, impaired, and dislocated;" but the moment you are brought face to face with the great truths uttered by Darwin, you admit "that the moral history of man has been distinctly an evolution from the first until now." Is not this a fountain that brings forth sweet and bitter waters?

I insist that the discoveries of Darwin do away absolutely with the inspiration of the scriptures—with the account of creation in Genesis—and demonstrate not simply the falsity. not simply the wickedness, but the foolishness, of the "sacred volume."

If you are convinced that Moses and Darwin are in exact accord, will you be good enough to tell who. in your judgment, were the parents of Adam and Eve? Do you find in Darwin any theory that satisfactorily accounts for the "inspired fact" that a rib. commencing with monogonic propagation—falling into halves by a contraction in the middle—reaching, after many ages of evolution, the amphigonic stage, and then, by the survival of the fittest, assisted by natural selection, molded and modified by environment, became, at last, the mother of the human race?

According to your idea, Jehovah prepared a home for his children—first a garden in which they should be tempted and from which they should be driven; then a world filled with briers and thorns and wild and poisonous beasts—a world in which the air should be filled with the enemies of human life—a world in which disease should be contagious, and in which it was impossible to tell, except by actual experiment, the poisonous from the nutritious. And these children were allowed to liv in dens and holes and fight their way against monstrous serpents and crouching beasts—were allowed to liv in ignorance and fear—to hav false ideas of this good and loving God—ideas so false that they made of him a fiend—ideas so false that they sacrificed their wives and babes to appease the imaginary wrath of this monster. And this God gave to different nations different ideas of himself, knowing that in consequence of that these nations would meet upon countless fields of death and drain each other's veins.

Would it not hav been better had the world been so that parents would transmit only their virtues—only their perfections, physical and mental—allowing their diseases and their vices to perish with them?

In my Reply to Dr. Field I had asked: Why should God demand a sacrifice from man? Why should the infinit ask anything from the finite? Should the sun beg from the glow-worm, and should the momentary spark excite the envy of the source of light?

Upon which you remark, "that if the infinit is to make no demands upon the finite, by parity of reasoning, the great and strong should scarcely make them on the weak and small."

Can this be called reasoning? Why should the infinit demand a sacrifice from man? In the first place, the infinit is conditionless—the infinit cannot want—the infinit has. A conditioned being may want; but the gratification of a want involves a change of condition. If God be conditionless, he can hav no wants—consequently, no human being can gratify the infinit.

But you insist that "if the infinit is to make no demands upon the finite, by parity of reasoning the great and strong should scarcely make them on the weak and small."

The great hav wants. The strong are often in need, in peril, and the great and strong often need the services of the small and weak. It was the mouse that freed the lion. England is a great and powerful nation—yet she may need the assistance of the weakest of her citizens. The world is filled with illustrations.

The lack of logic is in this: The infinit cannot want anything; the strong and the great may, and as a fact always do. The great and the strong cannot help the infinit—they can help the small and the weak, and the small and the weak can often help the great and strong.

You ask: "Why then should the father make demands of love, obedience, and sacrifice from his young child?"

No sensible father ever demanded love from his child. Every civilized father knows that love rises like the perfume from a flower. You cannot command it by simple authoritv. It cannot obey. A father demands obedience from a child for the good of the child and for the good of himself. But suppose the father to be infinit—why should the child sacrifice anything for him?

B it it may be that you answer all these questions, all these difficulties, by admitting, as you hav in your Remarks, "that these problems are insoluble by our understanding."

Why, then, do you accept them? Why do you defend that which you cannot understand? Why does your reason volunteer as a soldier under the flag of the incomprehensible?

I asked of Dr. Field, and I ask again, this question: Why should an infinitly wise and powerful God destroy the good and preserve the vile?

What do I mean by this question? Simply this: The earthquake, the lightning, the pestilence, are no respecters of persons. The vile are not always destroyed, the good are not always saved. I asked: Why should God treat all alike in this world, and in another make an infinit difference? This, I suppose, is "insoluble to our understanding."

Why should Jehovah allow his worshipers, his adorers. to be destroved by his enemies? Can you by any possibility answer this question?

You may account for all these inconsistencies, these cruel contradictions, as John Wesley accounted for earthquakes when he insisted that they were produced by the wickedness of men, and that the only wav to prevent them was for everybody to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. And you may hav some way of showing that Mr. Wesley's idea is entirely consistent with the theories of Mr. Darwin.

Again and again you hav called me to account for "mere suggestions and assertions without proof;" and yet your remarks are filled with assertions and mere suggestions without proof.

You admit that "great believers are not able to explain the inequalities of adjustment between human beings and the conditions in which they hav been set down to work out their destiny."

How do you know "that they hav been set down to work out their destiny?" If that was, and is, the purpose, then the being who settled the "destiny," and the means by which it was to be "worked out," is responsible for all that happens.

And is this the end of your argument, "That you are not able to explain the inequalities of adjustment between human beings?" Is the solution of this problem bevond your power? Does the Bible shed no light? Is the Christian in the presence of this question as dumb as the Agnostic? When the injustice of this world is so flagrant that you can not harmonize that awful fact with the wisdom and goodness of an infinit God, do you not see that you hav surrendered, or at least that you hav raised a flag of truce beneath which your adversarv accepts as final your statement that you do not know and that your imagination is not sufficient to frame an excuse for God?

Hav you abandoned Jehovah? Is man more just than he? Hav you appealed from him to the standard of reason? Is it possible that the leader of the English Liberals is nearer civilized than Jehovah?

Do you know that in this sentence you demonstrate the existence of a dawn in your mind? This sentence makes it certain that in the east of the midnight of Episcopal superstition there is the herald of the coming day. And if this sentence shows a dawn. what shall I say of the next:

"We are not entitled, either for or against belief, to set up in this province any rule of investigation except such as common sense teaches us to use in the ordinary conduct of life?" This certainly is a morning star. Let me take this statement, let me hold it as a torch, and by its light I beg of you to read the Bible once again.

Is it in accordance with reason that an infinitly good and loving God would drown a world that he had taken no means to civilize—to whom he had given no Bible, no gospel—taught no scientific fact, and in which the seeds of art had not been sown; that he would create a world that ought to be drowned? That a being of infinit wisdom would create a rival, knowing that the rival would fill perdition with countless souls destined to suffer eternal pain? Is it according to common sense that an infinitly good God would order some of his children to kill others? That he would command soldiers to rip open with the sword of war the bodies of women—wreaking vengeance on babes unborn? Is it according to reason that a good, loving, compassionate, and just God would establish slavery among men, and that a pure God would uphold polygamy? Is it according to common sense that he who wished to make men merciful and loving would demand the sacrifice of animals, so that his altars would be wet with the blood of oxen, sheep, and doves? Is it according to reason that a good God would inflict tortures upon his ignorant children—that he would torture animals to death—and is it in accordance with common sense and reason that this God would create countless billions of people knowing that they would be eternally damned?

What is common sense? Is it the result of observation, reason, and experience, or is it the child of credulity?

There is this curious fact: The far past and the far future seem to belong to the miraculous and the monstrous. The present, as a rule, is the realm of common sense. If you say to a man, "Eighteen hundred years ago the dead were raised," he will reply, "Yes, I know that." And if you say, "A hundred thousand years from now all the dead will be raised," he will probably reply, "I presume so." But if you tell him, "I saw a dead man raised to-day," he will ask, "From what madhouse hav you escaped?"

The moment we decide "according to reason," "according to the balance of evidence," we are charged with "having violated the laws of social morality and decency," and the defender of the miraculous and the incomprehensible takes another position.

The theologian has a city of refuge to which he flies—an old breastwork behind which he kneels—a rifle-pit into which he crawls. You hav described this city, this breastwork, this rifle-pit, and also the leaf under which the ostrich of theology thrusts its head. Let me quote:

"Our demands for evidence must be limited by the general reason of the case. Does that general reason of the case make it probable that a finite being, with a finite place in a comprehensiv scheme devised and administered by a being who is infinit, would be able even to embrace within his view, or rightly to appreciate all the motivs or aims that there may hav been in the mind of the divine disposer?"

And this is what you call "deciding by the use of the faculty of reason," "according to the evidence," or at least "according to the balance of evidence." This is a conclusion reached by a "rule of investigation such as common sense teaches us to use in the ordinary conduct of life." Will you hav the kindness to explain what it is to act contrary to evidence, or contrary to common sense? Can you imagin a superstition so gross that it cannot be defended by that argument?

Nothing, it seems to me, could hav been easier than for Jehovah to hav reasonably explained his scheme. You may answer that the human intellect is not sufficient to understand the explanation. Why then do not theologians stop explaining? Why do they feel it incumbent upon them to explain that which they admit God would hav explained had the human mind been capable of understanding it?

How much better would it hav been if Jehovah had said a few things on these subjects! It always seemed wonderful to me that he spent several days and nights on Mount Sinai explaining to Moses how he could detect the presence of leprosy without once thinking to giv him a prescription for its cure.

There were thousands and thousands of opportunities for this God to withdraw from these questions the shadow and the cloud. When Jehovah out of the whirlwind asked questions of Job, how much better it would hav been if Job had asked and Jehovah had answered!

You say that we should be governed by evidence and by common sense. Then you tell us that the questions are beyond the reach of reason, and with which common sense has nothing to do. If we then ask for an explanation, you reply in the scornful challenge of Dante.

. . . . . .

Would it not hav been better if Christ had told his disciples that they must not persecute; that they had no right to destroy their fellow-men; that they must not put heretics in dungeons, or destroy them with flames; that they must not invent and use instruments of torture; that they must not appeal to brutality, nor endeavor to sow with bloody hands the seeds of peace? Would it not hav been better had he said: "I come not to bring a sword, but peace?" Would not this hav saved countless cruelties and countless lives?

You seem to think that you hav fully answered my objection when you say that Christ taught the absolute indissolubility of marriage.

Why should a husband and wife be compelled to liv with each other after love is dead? Why should the wife still be bound in indissoluble chains to a husband who is cruel, infamous, and false? Why should her life be destroyed because of his? Why should she be chained to a criminal and an outcast? Nothing can be more unphilosophic than this. Why fill the world with the children of indifference and hatred?

The marriage contract is the most important, the most sacred, that human beings can make. It will be sacredly kept by good men and by good women. But if a loving woman—tender, noble, and true—makes this contract with a man whom she believed to be worthy of all respect and love, and who is found to be a cruel, worthless wretch, why should her life be lost?

Do you not know that the indissolubility of the marriage contract leads to its violation, forms an excuse for immorality, eats out the very heart of truth, and givs to vice that which alone belongs to love?

But in order that you may know why the objection was raised, I call your attention to the fact that Christ offered a reward, not only in this world but in another, to any husband who would desert his wife. And do you know that this hideous offer caused millions to desert their wives and children?

You hav called me to an account for what I said in regard to Ananias and Sapphira. First, I am charged with having said that the apostles conceived the idea of having all things in common, and you denounce this as an interpolation; second, "that motivs of prudence are stated as a matter of fact to hav influenced the offending couple"—and this is charged as an interpolation; and, third, that I stated that the apostles sent for the wife of Ananias—and this is characterized as a pure invention.

To me it seems reasonable to suppose that the idea of having all things in common was conceived by those who had nothing, or had the least, and not by those who had plenty. In the last verses of Acts iv you will find this:

Neither was there any among them that lacked, for as many as were possessed of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the apostles' feet: and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need. And Joses, who by the apostles was surnamed Barnabas (which is, being interpreted, the son of consolation), a Levite and of the country of Cyprus, having land, sold it, and brought the money, and laid it at the apostles' feet.

Now, it occurred to me that the idea was in all probability suggested by the men at whose feet the property was laid. It never entered my mind that the idea originated with those who had land for sale. There may be a different standard by which human nature is measured in your country, than in mine; but if the thing had happened in the United States, I feel absolutely positiv that it would hav been at the suggestion of the apostles.

Ananias, with Sapphira, his wife, sold a possession and kept back part of the price, his wife also being privy to it, and brought a certain part and laid it at the apostles' feet.

In my Letter to Dr. Field I stated—not at the time pretending to quote from the New Testament—that Ananias and Sapphira, after talking the matter over, not being entirely satisfied with the collaterals, probably concluded to keep a little—just enough to keep them from starvation if the good and pious bankers should abscond. It never occurred to me that anv man would imagin that this was a quotation, and I feel like asking your pardon for having led you into this error. We are informed in the Bible that "they kept back a part of the price." It occurred to me, "judging by the rule of investigation according to common sense," that there was a reason for this, and I could think of no reason except that they did not care to trust the apostles with all, and that they kept back just a little, thinking it might be useful if the rest should be lost.

According to the account, after Peter had made a few remarks to Ananias,

Ananias fell down and gave up the ghost; . . . and the young men arose, wound him up, and carried him out, and buried him. And it was about the space of three hours after, when his wife, not knowing what was done, came in.

Whereupon Peter said:

Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much? And she said, Yea, for so much. Then Peter said unto her, How is it that ye hav agreed together to tempt the spirit of the Lord? Behold, the feet of them which hav buried thy husband are at the door, and shall carry thee out. Then fell she down straightway at his feet, and yielded up the ghost; and the young men came in, and found her dead, and, carrying her forth, buried her by her husband.

The only objection found to this is, that I inferred that the apostles had sent for her. Sending for her was not the offense. The failure to tell her what had happened to her husband was the offense—keeping his fate a secret from her in order that she might be caught in the same net that had been set for her husband by Jehovah. This was the offense. This was the mean and cruel thing to which I objected. Hav you answered that?

Of course, I feel sure that the thing never occurred—the probability being that Ananias and Sapphira never lived and never died. It is probably a story invented by the early church to make the collection of subscriptions somewhat easier.

And yet, we find a man in the nineteenth century, foremost of his fellow-citizens in the affairs of a great nation, upholding this barbaric view of God.

Let me beg of you to use your reason "according to the rule suggested by common sense." Let us do what little we can to rescue the reputation, even of a Jewish myth, from the calumnies of ignorance and fear.

So, again, I am charged with having given certain words as a quotation from the Bible in which two passages are combined—"They who believe and are baptized shall be saved, and they who believe not shall be damned. And these shall go away into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels."

They were given as two passages. No one for a moment supposed that they would be read together as one, and no one imagined that anyone in answering the argument would be led to believe that they were intended as one. Neither was there in this the slightest negligence, as I was answering a man who is perfectly familiar with the Bible. The objection was too small to make. It is hardly large enough to answer—and had it not been made by you it would not hav been answered.

You are not satisfied with what I hav said upon the subject of immortality. What I said was this: The idea of immortality, that like a sea has ebbed and flowed in the human heart, with its countless waves of hope and fear beating against the shores and rocks of time and fate, was not born of any book, nor of any creed, nor of any religion. It was born of human affection, and it will continue to ebb and flow beneath the mists and clouds of doubt and darkness as long as love kisses the lips of death.

You answer this by saying that "the Egyptians were believers in immortality, but were not a people of high intellectual development."

How such a statement tends to answer what I hav said is beyond my powers of discernment. Is there the slightest connection between my statement and your objection?

You make still another answer, and say that "the ancient Greeks were a race of perhaps unparalleled intellectual capacity, and that notwithstanding that, the most powerful mind of the Greek philosophy, that of Aristotle, had no clear conception of a personal existence in a future state?" May I be allowed to ask this simple question: Who has?

Are you urging an objection to the dogma of immortality, when you say that a race of unparalleled intellectual capacity had no confidence in it? Is that a doctrin believed only by people who lack intellectual capacity? I stated that the idea of immortality was born of love. You reply, "The Egyptians believed it, but they were not intellectual." Is not this a non sequitur? The question is, Were they a loving people?

Does history show that there is a moral governor of the world? What witnesses shall we call? The billions of slaves who were paid with blows?—the countless mothers whose babes were sold? Hav we time to examin the Waldenses, the Covenanters of Scotland, the Catholics of Ireland, the victims of St. Bartholomew, of the Spanish Inquisition, all those who hav died in flames? Shall we hear the story of Bruno? Shall we ask Servetus? Shall we ask the millions slaughtered by Christian swords in America—all the victims of ambition, of perjury, of ignorance, of superstition and revenge, of storm and earthquake, of famin, flood, and fire?

I still insist that human affection is the foundation of the idea of immortality; that love was the first to speak that word, no matter whether they who spoke it were savage or civilized, Egyptian or Greek. But if we are immortal—if there be another world—why was it not clearly set forth in the Old Testament? Certainly, the authors of that book had an opportunity to learn it from the Egyptians. Why was it not revealed by Jehovah? Why did he waste his time in giving orders for the consecration of priests—in saying that they must hav sheep's blood put on their right ears and on their right thumbs and on their right big toes? Could a God with any sense of humor giv such directions, or watch without huge laughter the performance of such a ceremony? In order to see the beauty, the depth, and tenderness of such a consecration, is it essential to be in a state of "reverential calm?"

Is it not strange that Christ did not tell of another world distinctly, clearly, without parable, and without the mist of metaphor?

The fact is that the Hindoos, the Egyptians, the Greeks, and the Romans taught the immortality of the soul, not as a glittering guess—a possible perhaps—but as a clear and demonstrated truth, for many centuries before the birth of Christ.

If the Old Testament proves anything, it is that death ends all. And the New Testament, by basing immortality on the resurrection of the body, but "keeps the word of promis to our ear and breaks it to our hope."

In my Reply to Dr. Field, I said: "The truth is, that no one can justly be held responsible for his thoughts. The brain thinks without asking our consent; we believe, or disbelieve, without an effort of the will. Belief is a result. It is the effect of evidence upon the mind. The scales turn in spite of him who watches. There is no opportunity of being honest or dishonest in the formation of an opinion. The conclusion is entirely independent of desire. We must believe, or we must doubt, in spite of what we wish."

Does the brain think without our consent? Can we control our thought? Can we tell what we are going to think to-morrow?

Can we stop thinking?

Is belief the result of that which to us is evidence, or is it a product of the will? Can the scales in which reason weighs evidence be turned by the will? Why, then, should evidence be weighed? If it all depends on the will, what is evidence? Is there any opportunity of being dishonest in the formation of an opinion? Must not the man who forms the opinion know what it is? He cannot knowingly cheat himself. He cannot be deceived with dice that he loads. He cannot play unfairly at solitaire without knowing that he has lost the game. He cannot knowingly weigh with false scales and believe in the correctness of the result.

You hav not even attempted to answer my arguments upon these points, but you hav unconsciously avoided them. You did not attack the citadel. In military parlance, you proceeded to "shell the woods." The noise is precisely the same as though every shot had been directed against the enemy's position, but the result is not. You do not seem willing to implicitly trust the correctness of your aim. You prefer to place the target after the shot.

The question is whether the will knowingly can change evidence, and whether there is any opportunity of being dishonest in the formation of an opinion. You hav changed the issue. You hav erased the word formation and interpolated the word expression.

Let us examin your case: If a father is consciously swayed by his love for his son, and for that reason says that his son is innocent, then he has not expressed his opinion. If he is unconsciously swayed and says that his son is innocent, then he has expressed his opinion. In both instances his opinion was independent of his will; but in the first instance he did not express his opinion. You will certainly see this distinction between the formation and the expression of an opinion.

The same argument applies to the man who consciously has a desire to condemn. Such a conscious desire cannot affect the testimony—cannot affect the opinion. Queen Elizabeth undoubtedly desired the death of Mary Stuart, but this conscious desire could not hav been the foundation on which rested Elizabeth's opinion as to the guilt or innocence of her rival. It is barely possible that Elizabeth did not express her real opinion. Do you believe that the English judges, in the matter of the Popish Plot, gave judgment in accordance with their opinions? Are you satisfied that Napoleon expressed his real opinion when he justified himself for the assassination of the Duc d'Enghien?

If you answer these questions in the affirmativ, you admit that I am right. If you answer in the negativ, you admit that you are wrong. The moment you admit that the opinion formed cannot be changed by expressing a pretended opinion, your argument is turned against yourself.

It is admitted that prejudice strengthens, weakens, and colors evidence; but prejudice is honest. And when one acts knowingly against the evidence, that is not by reason of prejudice.

According to my views of propriety, it would be unbecoming for me to say that your argument on these questions is "a piece of plausible shallowness." Such language might be regarded as lacking "reverential calm," and I therefore refrain from even characterizing it as plausible.

The dark continent of motiv and desire has never been explored. In the brain, that wondrous world with one inhabitant, there are recesses dim and dark, treacherous sands and dangerous shores, where seeming sirens tempt and fade; streams that rise in unknown lands from hidden springs, strange seas with ebb and flow of tides, resistless billows urged by storms of flame, profound and awful depths hidden by mist of dreams, obscure and phantom realms where vague and fearful things are half revealed, jungles where passion's tigers crouch, and skies of cloud and blue where fancies fly with painted wings that dazzle and mislead; and the poor sovereign of this pictured world is led by old desires and ancient hates, and stained by crimes of many vanished years, and pushed by hands that long ago were dust, until he feels like some bewildered slave that Mockery has throned and crowned.

No one pretends that the mind of man is perfect—that it is not affected by desires, colored by hopes weakened by fears, deformed by ignorance, and distorted by superstition. But all this has nothing to do with the innocence of opinion

It may be that the Thugs were taught that murder is innocent; but did the teachers believe what they taught? Did the pupils believe the teachers? Did not Jehovah teach that the act which we describe as murder was a duty? Were not his teachings practiced by Moses and Joshua and Jephthah and Samuel and David? Were they honest? But what has all this to do with the point at issue?

Society has the right to protect itself, even from honest murderers and conscientious thieves. The belief of the criminal does not disarm society; it protects itself from him as from a poisonous serpent, or from a beast that livs on human flesh. We are under no obligation to stand still and allow ourselvs to be murdered by one who honestly thinks that it is his duty to take our lives. And yet according to your argument, we hav no right to defend ourselvs from honest Thugs. Was Saul of Tarsus a Thug when he persecuted Christians "even unto strange cities?" Is the Thug of India more ferocious than Torquemada, the Thug of Spain?

If belief depends upon the will, can all men hav correct opinions who will to hav them? Acts are good, or bad, according to their consequences, and not according to the intentions of the actors. Honest opinions may be wrong, and opinions dishonestly expressed may be right.

Do you mean to say that because passion and prejudice, reckless "pilots 'twixt the dangerous shores of will and judgment," sway the mind, the opinions which you hav expressed in your Remarks to me are not your opinions? Certainly you will admit that, in all probability you hav prejudices and passions, and if so, can the opinions that you hav expressed, according to your argument, be honest? My lack of confidence in your argument givs me perfect confidence in your candor. You may remember the philosopher who retained his reputation for veracity in spite of the fact that he kept saying, "There is no truth in man."

Are only those opinions honest that are formed without any interference of passion, affection, habit, or fancy? What would the opinion of a man without passions, affections, or fancies be worth? The alchemist gave up his search for a universal solvent upon being asked in what kind of vessel he expected to keep it when found.

. . . . . .

Many will regret that you did not giv your views upon the main questions—the principal issues—involved, instead of calling attention, for the most part, to the unimportant. If men were discussing the causes and results of the Franco-Prussian war, it would hardly be worth while for a third person to interrupt the argument for the purpose of calling attention to a misspelled word in the terms of surrender.

If we admit that man is responsible for his opinions and his thoughts, and that his will is perfectly free, still these admissions do not even tend to prove the inspiration of the Bible, or the "divine scheme of redemption."

In my judgment, the days of the supernatural are numbered. The dogma of inspiration must be abandoned. As man advances—as his intellect enlarges—as his knowledge increases—as his ideals become nobler, the Bibles and creeds will lose their authority—the miraculous will be classed with the impossible, and the idea of special providence will be discarded. Thousands of religions hav perished, innumerable gods hav died, and why should the religion of our time be exempt from the common fate?

Creeds cannot remain permanent in a world in which knowledge increases. Science and superstition cannot peaceably occupy the same brain. This is an age of investigation, of discovery and thought. Science destroys the dogmas that mislead the mind and waste the energies of man. It points out the ends that can be accomplished; takes into consideration the limits of our faculties; fixes our attention on the affairs of this world, and erects beacons of warning on the dangerous shores. It seeks to ascertain the conditions of health, to the end that life may be enriched and lengthened, and it reads with a smile this passage:

> And God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul, so that from his body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them.

Science is the enemy of fear and credulity. It invites investigation, challenges the reason, stimulates inquiry, and welcomes the unbeliever. It seeks to giv food and shelter and raiment, education and liberty, to the human race. It welcomes every fact and every truth. It has furnished a foundation for morals, a philosophy for the guidance of man. From all books it selects the good, and from all theories, the true. It seeks to civilize the human race by the cultivation of the intellect and heart. It refines through art, music, and the drama—giving voice and expression to every noble thought. The mysterious does not excite the feeling of worship, but the ambition to understand. It does not pray—it works. It does not answer inquiry with the malicious cry of "blasphemy." Its feelings are not hurt by contradiction, neither does it ask to be protected by law from the laughter of heretics. It has taught man that he cannot walk beyond the horizon—that the questions of origin and destiny cannot be answered—that an infinit personality cannot be comprehended by a finite being, and that the truth of any system of religion based on the supernatural cannot by any possibility be established—such a religion not being within the domain of evidence. And, above all, it teaches that all our duties are here—that all our obligations are to sentient beings; that intelligence, guided by kindness, is the highest possible wisdom; and that "man believes not what he would, but what he can"

And after all, it may be that "to ride an unbroken horse with the reins thrown upon his neck"—as you charge me with doing—givs a greater variety of sensations, a keener delight, and a better prospect of winning the race than to sit solemnly astride of a dead one, in "a deep reverential calm," with the bridle firmly in your hand.

At the head of the "Roll of Honor" is the executiv of the beautiful city of Racine, Wis., who takes a life membership. From personal knowledge, I can say he has and will continue to hold an enviable reputation as a Freethought mayor. When so many Freethinkers do their utmost to hide their light under a bushel, it is some satisfaction to note that one of the most outspoken Infidels receives the suffrages of a large majority of the citizens in a city formerly dominated by the presence of a sectarian college and a goodly share of churches. This should teach timid Freethinkers that even Christians respect them more for true moral courage.

Jas. A. Smith, of Hudson, N. Y., joins "our glorious company," adding $15 to a previous remittance of $10, and a life certificate is forwarded. It is a good way to begin a new life without having to be "born again." May it be a pleasant and long, long life to Brother Smith, for he and Leonard Geiger hav everlastingly aroused that Sleepy Hollow region, giving no rest to the Rip Van Winkles of orthodoxy, and hav nobly sustained the battle for universal mental liberty in their efforts to obliterate (by lectures and literature) the last trace of the appalling nightmare which superstition has cast over humanity. To them it is a labor of love to straighten out the furrows from human brows, by presenting the absurdity of the dogmas and creeds by which people hav been held in worse than physical bondage; to replace moans by ripples of laughter; to let the light of reason, the joy of love, and human kindness assert themselvs where ignorance and hypocrisy held undisputed sway. For these grand, self-imposed labors we say, "All hail, ye men of Hudson!"

From Petaluma, Cal., W. H. Pepper, the oldest nurseryman in that region of luscious fruits and fragrant flowers, forwards $10 as his contribution to the Campaign Fund. From a comparativly forbidding desert such men hav made the face of Nature smile, and now the aim of Brother Pepper is, doubtless, that humanity shall hav a similar legacy in the undisturbed enjoyment of those glorious advantages which that salubrious region possesses—that priestcraft shall not blight or stunt the onward march of mental progress. Your stimulant is quite seasonable, Brother Pepper.

> And thou, Rochelle, our own Rochelle,
> Proud city of our—Wettstein!

For were it not for Otto who, among the Liberals at least, would know of Rochelle, Ill? And who is now so ignorant that he has not heard of the beautiful Freethought badge-pin he has designed? Rochelle, through Wettstein, has become as famous for his gems of intellect and his beautiful jewels of adornment as the city which succored the Huguenots of France and which Macaulay has immortalized. Otto Wettstein, in forwarding Brother Lefferty's donation, sends $15 worth of badge pins for the good of the cause—$10 for the American Secular Union and $5 for the Chicago society. We shall dispose of those for currency as soon as possible; and hereby send the thanks of each association to the philosopher of northern Illinois. Brother Wettstein's article on "Astral Bodies," in last Saturday's Herald, made them mighty "thin" indeed.

The Fayette county (Iowa) Secular Union held its annual meeting May 24th, at which the pledge of $10 made by Vice-president Wm. Redfield at the Congress was approved and paid. The Fayette county Secularists are a splendid company, and Messrs. Redfield, Alex. Risk, and Daniel Davis hav all contributed generously, and wish the next Congress could be held at Chicago. J. S. Brewer has been elected president; Thos. Keeper, corresponding secretary; recording secretary, A. D. Godfrey; treasurer, Wm. Redfield; committee of arrangements, Alex. Risk, Daniel Davis, John Pember, J. E. Krost, and Dr. Matoon.

W. P. Brooks, M.D., feels deeply interested in the success of the American Secular Union, and manifests it by forwarding fifty copies of his pamphlet just published, to be sold for the benefit of the Campaign Fund, entitled, "Hard Times and the Way Out." Mrs. Freeman has this to say of its merits:

That the doctor has succeeded in marshaling a formidable array of facts in support of the "government's right to issue full legal tender money" will not be denied by the most bigoted of his hardpan opponents. He quotes the New York Tribune as saying: "The time is near when they [the banks] will feel themselvs compelled to act strongly. Meanwhile a very good thing has been done. The machinery is now furnished by which, in any emergency, the financial corporations of the East can act together on a single day's notice with such power that no act of Congress can overcome or resist their decision." From this and many other illustrations the doctor argues that "the people are helpless in the hands of the money power," and "the boasted republic is at the feet of shylocks." As the proceeds of the sale of these pamphlets is given to the American Secular Union, it is to be hoped that those interested in the poverty of the people will order from the secretary at once.

Jas. Lefferty is the banner Liberal of the town of Banner in Idaho, and he purposes to help the Secular Union, the American idea, in that bright and prosperous land. Notice he was sending to Brother Wettstein for a gold watch, which shows he as a Liberal purposes not only to get his money's worth but also to patronize a friend of Freethought.

Brother Phillips, of Algonquin, Ill., who attended the last Congress, forwards $5 to redeem his pledge, and words of cheer and good-will to the cause. I wish we could meet him at the next Congress, as he is a wide-awake and thoroughgoing friend of mental freedom.

A. T. McMillan sends for an annual membership, and some literature to enlighten the hidebound people of his section. Brother McMillan is chief commander of the Knights of Pythias, a man of position, influence, and integrity.

My old-time friend Wunnebold Boemer, proprietor of the Illinois Wire-works, a member of our Union and an uncompromising Freethinker, sends in his pledge made at the Congress. Brother Boemer is a social reformer and inventor, a scientific and philosophic thinker. For nearly twelve years he has been working to perfect the application of a new motiv power, atmospheric air pressure. On this he has spent a great deal of time, study, and money, ever looking forward to its realization, although he does not propose to neglect too much his present requirements for a mere possibility. It is to be hoped his idea will prove a benefit not only to himself, but to the world.

From Mrs. K. Parker and Mrs. R. H. Schwartz, of Anaheim and San José respectivly, we hav received charter fees, notice of which has been already given.

I am here in "the future great," in response to several Macedonian cries to come over and help him from our hard-working, tireless friend, I. S. Lee, who has been laboring for an organization ever since he came, which is now fiat accompli, each of the following persons having subscribed $1 for that purpose: Major C. S. Ebaugh, Prof. Hv. Schwartz. Prof. G. Banicelli, Mr. and Mrs. S A. Rendl, and Miss Stella Campbell. The latter, formerly of Chicago and Colorado, is now a teacher here. Major Ebaugh is a gentleman of wealth and social position, being president of several organizations. Dr. Schwartz holds the enviable position of president of a medical college, and the rest are gentlemen of culture. The organization is likely to take high rank from the character of the persons who are its moving spirits. Great credit is due Brother Lee for his persistent endeavors at this most discouraging labor.

Mr. and Mrs. Lake, of Garrettsville, O., join in a donation and send words of cheer to the secretary, for which he is exceedingly grateful.

Mr. Thomas Knight, of Ceresco, Mich., though eighty-three, still keeps up his opposition to the quartet of churches which completely control his town and neighborhood. The valor of old Mr. Knight is like that of the knights of old.

Friend P. B. Bosworth, of Marseilles, Ill., sends $1 for leaflets. He proposes to keep up the good work he helped to inaugurate here at the Congress.

The Chicago Union desires to extend its thanks to H. L. Green, editor and publisher of the Freethinkers' Magazine, of Buffalo, N. Y., for his generous and timely donation of copies of his excellent publication, together with many copies of Colonel Ingersoll's masterly centennial oration.

St. Louis, Mo. E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

Clark Braden Rightly Described.

From the Oakland, Cal., Enquirer.

The main hall in the Medical College building contained an audience of some two hundred persons last night [May 25th], attracted by the announcement that a free lecture would be delivered by Samuel Putnam, president of the American Secular Union, upon the subject "Science and Theology." Near the door stood a table, upon which was displayed a collection of the literature of Liberalism and Freethought, including the works of Thomas Paine, Voltaire, Robert G. Ingersoll, Helen H. Gardener, the lecturer, and others.

Shortly after 7:30 P.M. A. H. Schou announced that the audience would be entertained by several selections by the Oakland Zither Club preceding the lecture.

The speaker of the evening, Samuel P. Putnam, one of the editors of Freethought, a Liberal journal, and author of several books of poems and romances, was then introduced. He was greeted with applause. He said:

Science and theology are two different ways of looking at the universe, man, and ourselvs. The time was when theology reigned. Then the mind was enthralled and the intelligence of man bound down to dogma. Now there is a change; science is supreme and thought is free. Liberality prevails. When we are talking about theology we must distinguish between that and religion. Religion is of the heart; theology, of the mind. Religion is a natural impulse of the heart. Theology is the theory of the unnatural, the unknown. All existence is natural. Science is the study of nature. Therefore, theology is not science. It cannot be natural. It is simply organized ignorance, if you will allow the term. It has never made any advance. It has never discovered a single fact. When theology reigned, what did it giv us? Not invention, not fruitful fields. It concerned itself with such questions as, How many angels can dance upon the point of a needle? This is the epitome of its arguments.

Let us contrast the methods of the theologian and of the man of science. The theologian opens his eyes with preconceived ideas and looks for facts to support them. He pushes all others aside. He is blind to those which do not support his case. He is like the lawyer who only discloses and puts forward the facts which favor his client. Christianity is the client of the theologian. His fee is a fat salary and a good living. His duty is to clear Christianity at the bar of public judgment.

How is it with the man of science? The first step with him is observation. When he has gathered facts, he begins to generalize and classify them and then forms his conclusion. He takes in everything. It makes no difference to him if a fact is ugly. Hence science is universal, theology partial. Theology reasons from theory to fact, science from facts to law.

Now let us consider the methods of consideration of the Bible. The acceptance of the book does not imply the acceptance of the theological theory as to the Bible. We may believe in Shakspere, but not in the Baconian theory of the writing of Shakspere. So with the Bible. Some say Liberals reject the Bible. We do not do that, but we reject the theory of its inspiration as a miraculous revelation. Theologians make the assertion; it rests with them to prove the affirmation. Let us consider the work. It is not a book, it is a collection of sixty books; the assertion in one instance does not prove true in the case of any other. The demonstration must be made in each instance.

Theology must prove in relation to the Bible four propositions: First, the authenticity; second, the genuinness; third, the inspiration; fourth, the infallibility. The proof of one proposition does not demonstrate the truth of any other.

The position of the Christian first is that the scripture is inspired by God. Now, Agnostics do not deny that there is a God, but we say we don't know. The theologians must demonstrate it. Now as to the authenticity of the book. If it is a revelation from God it ought to tell the truth about the creation.

The speaker then directed his argument to disproving the Mosaic account of creation. He referred to the Huxley-Gladstone discussion of the Mosaic cosmogony and said that there was an irreconcilable chasm in the conflict between the order of creation as given in Genesis and that of science.

The theological theory of heaven and hell were ridiculed. The speaker said:

There never was a doctrin so hideous as the theological doctrin of hell-fire. [Cheers.] If there is an immortality it is a continuation of this life. What makes happiness here, will hereafter. Theology paints this world as a vast vale of tears. Let us be kind, generous, loving, and we shall hav a heaven here by our own firesides. We believe that the world is better than it was yesterday; that it will be better in the future. We believe in the trinity: liberty, science, and humanity. Liberty the condition, science the instrumentality, humanity the glorious goal for which we strive. To this trinity let us consecrate ourselvs.

At the close of the address, C. R. Bennett stepped forward and presented Mr. Putnam with a letter, which he requested him to read. He said it was a challenge from Clark Braden. Mr. Schou then said that some time ago one of their number, Wallace F. Hughan, had died, and at his request the Liberal friends had conducted his funeral. Referring to the Enquirer reporter, he said that a reporter had come to the funeral and had given a very fair report. The reporter had asked if they had no religious service, and he had informed him that they had none. Now they would do something that was religious—they would take up a collection. In the mean time the Zither Club would play.

C. R. Bennett called upon the speaker to answer Braden's challenge. He was greeted with hisses and called to order. The music continued, and the collection was proceeded with and $6 35 taken up.

Bennett then took the floor, and, asking permission, proceeded to read the following:

OAKLAND, CAL., May 25, 1888.

S. P. PUTNAM, Sir: Will you read the inclosed challenge to your audience to-night, and state whether you hav the courage to accept it?

I will remove all basis for the subterfuge by which you tried to cover your back-out at Silverton, Ore., by this proposal. You shall lay before a committee of fair-minded skeptics the best indorsement you can get.

I will lay down before the same committee as strong indorsements as you can.

I will meet you before such committee, and they shall decide, after hearing both sides, whether you are justified in your excuses for refusing to meet me.

Will you read this to your audience and answer it?

Where is the courage of Infidelity and the president of its League? CLARK BRADEN.

Challenge to the Infidelity of the World. Propositions:

Clark Braden will meet in public oral debate, or in written debate, any Infidel living on the face of the earth, at any point where the English language is spoken, who has one-tenth the indorsement that he himself can furnish, on the following terms:

1. Do the great ideas and general principles inculcated in the language of the Israelite scriptures of the Old Testament, and the Christian scriptures of the New Testament, and completed in the inculcations of Jesus and his apostles, harmonize with a right use of human reason? Will they secure the highest use of human reason? And will they secure to man, here and hereafter, all the progress and happiness of which man is capable?

Braden will affirm.

2. Do the great ideas and general principles inculcated by modern Secularism harmonize with a right use of human reason? Will they secure the highest use of human reason? And are they sufficient, without the ideas of God, spirit, and future life, and any ideas necessarily based on those ideas, to secure to man all the progress and happiness of which man is capable?

Secularist will affirm.

The reading was interrupted by the chairman, Mr. Schou, who said, "We hav hired this hall, and you hav no right to come here and disturb our meeting."

Bennett: "I appeal to this audience to hear me through."

Chairman Schou: "I will put it to a vote whether you shall proceed. All in favor of it will say 'Aye.'"

The hall was silent. Bennett sat down.

Then there were cries, "Put him out."

Putnam advanced to the platform and said: "I will tell you why I will not meet this man in debate. He is a liar and blackguard."

Clark Braden, who had entered during the lecture and seated himself in the rear part of the hall, arose, and addressing the speaker, said, "Allow me to say, sir, that you are a miserable coward and liar."

Putnam replied, "I will not debate with Clark Braden. He is beneath my notice. Clark Braden has published a pamphlet which places him without the pale of honorable debate."

The speaker then dismissed the subject of the discussion, announcing that a meeting would be held at Irving Hall next Sunday evening, at which steps would be taken to organize the Liberalists in Oakland, San Francisco, and vicinity. The next thing would be to get up a grand Paine celebration in California. It was proposed to make a great power of Thomas Paine. The speaker said that he should go East before long to attend the Liberal Congress at Pittsburgh. He closed with a poetical peroration on Freethought.

In a brief interview after the lecture Mr. Putnam said the reason that he refused to debate with Braden was that he dealt in personalities. His pamphlet, Putnam remarked, was a violent attack upon the personal character of Colonel Ingersoll and his family, and his action was not becoming in controversy or debate.

How God Works.

From the Marlboro, Mass., Times.

God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform,

Says the late Mr. William Cowper, and we hav seen remarks of a similar tenor attributed to other equally well-informed gentlemen. Rev. Mr. Rice told a story, in his last Sunday morning's discourse, to the effect that the wife of a celebrated reformer, who had struck a streak of despondency, put on mourning one morning under the impression that God was dead. We don't suppose he is really any deader to-day than he has been for the last five hundred million years, but some of his most enthusiastic and infatuated followers seem to think he is either asleep or gone out of business; and here comes the report of a little incident which has a tendency to strengthen that belief.

Argonia, Kan., is a little city whose imprescriptible title to undying fame is the alleged fact that it was the first municipality in the land to elect a lady mayoress. Mrs. Susanna Salter was the euphonious name the lady sailed under, and which, with Argonia, she has made famous. Under her rigid administration the town became renowned as a stronghold and a fortress of the Lord. Under her saline rule, gambling, drinking, pool-playing, swearing, and staying out nights were unknown, and if ever there was a community where God could sit down and feel sort of at home, Argonia was its name and Mrs. Salter its ruleress.

Well, what became of this godly and good little retreat of virtue?

Well, a few days ago God sent one of his damnably destructiv cyclones round that way, and Argonia was wiped out of existence quicker than the devil could toast a heretic.

"Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth," said the late Mr. Saul, of Tarsus. We hope he won't take a liking to us.

Colonel Ingersoll's Decoration Day Oration.

[Every seat in the great Opera House was filled. and hundreds stood, glad to find any place where they could see and hear. And the gathering and the proceedings were worthy of the occasion. The president, unfortunately, was unable to be present, and the three boxes at the left of the stage, which, draped with national flags, were reserved for him and his party, were filled with others. But Secretary Endicott and Mrs. and Miss Endicott and Daniel Lamont occupied the box, and in others sat Secretary Fairchild, Gen. Eli Parker, Colonel Ellis, Colonel Ingersoll, Mrs. Depew and her brother, W. A. Ogden Hegeman, Colonel Colwell, Joseph Naylor, Courtlandt Palmer, Capt. Ferdinand Ellis, Arthur Berry, Ex Senator Stephen W. Dorsey, Gen. Clinton B Fisk, and Gen. Henry W. Slocum, each accompanied by ladies, whose gay attire made a brilliant spectacle. While the vast assemblage was flowing in, the United States Army Depot Band, under the direction of Bandmaster Otto Prasser, played old army tunes, such as "Marching Through Georgia," "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp," "The Battle Cry of Freedom," and "Kingdom Coming." These excited the enthusiasm to a high pitch. Then appeared upon the platform John C. Limbeck, the chairman of the memorial committee, escorting Chauncey M. Depew, and followed by General Black, the Rev. Dr. Robert Collyer, General Sickles, and General Newton, and the applause was tremendous. All stood while Dr. Collyer offered prayer. In pathetic tones he prayed for General Sheridan's recovery, for the president, for the heroes that are left, and for the welfare and prosperity of the nation.

Mr. Depew, on taking the chair, was again greeted with great applause. He said: "We are here to-night as the guests of the Grand Army of the Republic. On any other day of the year the Grand Army of the Republic should be the nation's guests. Their valor gave us the opportunity which calls us together to-night. The republic is greater to-day than ever before. All that constitutes the glory of the republic and the prosperity of its citizens comes from what these men suffered and what they did. Many of them received death; many of them wounds; many of them in declining years of their lives are battling with hopeless poverty. The nation which owes all that it is to-day to what they did upon the battlefield should reserve at the national banquet board a plate and a seat for every veteran soldier who chooses to occupy it—not as a charity guest, but as the honored guest of the people. Nearly one-quarter of a century has passed since the war. The time has passed for grief in the glorious compensations which grant to us the enjoyments of life. The pangs of grief are but for the moment. They are assuaged by the recollections of the glorious deeds of those who are gone, the heroes whose memory is as imperishable as it is glorious. We here to-night, after this lapse of years, meet not as mourners, but we meet in joyful celebration of magnificent recollections and of triumph of ideas which came out of the victories of the war. We recall nothing which can arouse vindictivness or sectional passion. It is the glory of this commemoration that it recalls the most magnificent act of triumphant magnanimity that the world has ever seen. In the graves where we laid our heroes we buried passion, we buried sectionalism, we buried hate, we buried the shackles of the slave. We who belong to the Grand Army of the Republic hav no sympathy with what is known as 'waving the bloody shirt,' if it be meant by that, as it is meant by that, a constant iteration and reiteration in violent and vindictiv form of those sentiments which arouse passion on one side and vindictivness on the other—we hav none of it. But when, once a year, or on any particular occasion, it becomes necessary to state precisely what the civil war meant, what it was fought for, and what it accomplished—if that be waving the bloody shirt then let the bloody shirt be nailed to the mast. It is settled beyond all dispute that there is no earthly power, no combination of men or devils, that can dissolve these States. The only possible peril which can ever threaten us is the ballot. The casting of the ballot must be made absolutely free; the voter must be protected by the state and be enabled to cast his ballot without the slightest fear or favor of any man." After Mr Depew came Signora Eva Tetrazzini, who sang "Neina Mefistofele;" Rose Coghlan, who recited "The Charge of the Light Brigade" and "All Quiet on the Potomac;" Signor Italo Campanini, who was in his best voice, and sang with great applause "Salve Dinora," from Gounod's "Faust," and the New York Choral Union, who sang the "Song of the Vikings" and "Where are You going, My Pretty Maid?" Then came the orator of the occasion, Colonel Ingersoll, whose entire speech is printed herewith.—N. Y. Times.]

This is a sacred day—a day for gratitude and love.

To-day we commemorate more than independence, more than the birth of a nation, more than the fruits of the Revolution, more than physical progress, more than the accumulation of wealth, more than national prestige and power.

We commemorate the great and blessed victory over ourselvs—the triumph of civilization, the reformation of a people, the establishment of a government consecrated to the preservation of liberty and the equal rights of man.

Nations can win success, can be rich and powerful, can cover the earth with their armies, the seas with their fleets, and yet be selfish, small, and mean. Physical progress means opportunity for doing good. It means responsibility. Wealth is the end of the despicable, victory the purpose of brutality.

But there is something nobler than all these—something that rises above wealth and power, something above lands and palaces, something above raiment and gold—it is the love of right, the cultivation of the moral nature, the desire to do justice, the inextinguishable love of human liberty.

Nothing can be nobler than a nation governed by conscience; nothing more infamous than power without pity, wealth without honor and without the sense of justice.

Only by the soldiers of the right can the laurel be won or worn.

On this day we honor the heroes who fought to make our nation just and free, who broke the shackles of the slave, who freed the masters of the South and their allies of the North. We honor the chivalric men who made America the hope and beacon of the human race, the foremost nation of the world.

These heroes established the first republic, and demonstrated that a government in which the legally expressed will of the people is sovereign and supreme is the safest, strongest, securest, noblest, and the best.

They demonstrated the human right of the people, and of all the people, to make and execute the laws—that authority does not come from the clouds, nor from ancestry, nor from the crowned and titled, nor from constitutions and compacts, laws and customs—not from the admissions of the great, nor the concessions of the powerful and victorious—not from graves nor consecrated dust, not from treaties made between successful robbers, not from the decisions of corrupt and menial courts—not from the dead, but from the living; not from the past, but from the present, from the people of to-day, from the brain, from the heart, and from the conscience of those who liv and love and labor.

The history of this world for the most part is the history of conflict and war, of invasion, of conquest, of victorious wrong, of the many enslaved by the few.

Millions hav fought for kings, for the destruction and enslavement of their fellow-men. Millions hav battled for empire, and great armies hav been inspired by the hope of pillage; but for the first time in the history of this world millions of men battled for the right, fought to free not themselvs but others, not for prejudice but for principle, not for conquest but for conscience.

The men whom we honor were the liberators of a nation, of a whole country, North and South—of two races. They freed the body and the brain, gave liberty to master and to slave. They opened all the highways of thought, and gave to fifty millions of people the inestimable legacy of free speech.

They established the free exchange of thought. They gave to the air a flag without a stain, and they gave to their country a Constitution that honest men can reverently obey. They destroyed the hateful, the egotistic and provincial; they established a nation, a national spirit, a national pride, and a patriotism as broad as the great republic.

They did away with that ignorant and cruel prejudice that human rights depend on race or color, and that the superior race has the right to oppress the inferior. They established the sublime truth that the superior are the just, the kind, the generous, and merciful—that the really superior are the protectors, the defenders, and the saviors of the oppressed, of the fallen, the unfortunate, the weak and helpless. They established that greatest of all truths that nothing is nobler than to labor and suffer for others.

If we wish to know the extent of our debt to these heroes, these soldiers of the right, we must know what we were and what we are. A few years ago we talked about liberty, about the freedom of the world, and while so talking we enslaved our fellow-men. We were the stealers of babes and the whippers of women. We were in partnership with bloodhounds. We lived on unpaid labor. We held manhood in contempt. Honest toil was disgraceful, sympathy was a crime, pity was unconstitutional, humanity contrary to law, and charity was treason. Men were imprisoned for pointing out in heaven's dome the northern star—for giving food to the hungry, water to the parched lips of thirst, shelter to the hunted, succor to the oppressed. In those days criminals and courts, pirates and pulpits, were in partnership—liberty was only a word standing for the equal rights of robbers.

For many years we insisted that our fathers had founded a free government, that they were the lovers of liberty, believers in equal rights. We were mistaken. The colonists did not believe in the freedom of to-day. Their laws were filled with intolerance, with slavery, and the infamous spirit of caste. They persecuted and enslaved. Most of them were narrow, ignorant, and cruel. For the most part their laws were more brutal than those of the nations from which they came. They branded the forehead of intelligence, bored with hot irons the tongue of truth. They persecuted the good and enslaved the helpless. They were believers in pillories and whipping-posts for honest, thoughtful men.

When their independence was secured they adopted a Constitution that legalized slavery, and they passed laws making it the duty of freemen to prevent others from becoming free. They followed the example of kings and nobles. They knew that monarchs had been interested in the slave trade, and that the first English commander of a slave-ship divided his profits with a queen.

They forgot all the splendid things they had said—the great principles they had so proudly and eloquently announced. The sublime truths faded from their hearts. The spirit of trade, the greed for office, took possession of their souls. The lessons of history were forgotten. The voices coming from all the wrecks of kingdoms, empires, and republics on the shores of the great river were unheeded and unheard.

If the foundation is not justice the dome cannot be high enough or splendid enough to save the temple.

But above everything in the minds of our fathers was the desire for union—to create a nation, to become a power.

Our fathers compromised.

A compromise is a bargain in which each party defrauds the other and himself.

The compromise our fathers made was the coffin of honor and the cradle of war.

A brazen falsehood and a timid truth are the parents of compromise.

But some—the greatest and the best—believed in liberty for all. They repeated the splendid sayings of the Roman, "By the law of nature all men are free;" of the French king, "Men are born free and equal;" of the sublime Zeno, "All men are by nature equal and virtue alone establishes a difference between them."

In the year preceding the Declaration of Independence a society for the abolition of slavery was formed in Pennsylvania, and its first president was one of the wisest and greatest of men—Benjamin Franklin. A society of the same character was established in New York in 1785; its first president was John Jay, the second, Alexander Hamilton.

But in a few years these great men were forgotten. Parties rivaled each other in the defense of wrong. Politicians cared only for place and power. In the clamor of the heartless the voice of the generous was lost. Slavery became supreme. It dominated legislatures, courts, and parties; it rewarded the faithless and little; it degraded the honest and great.

And yet, through all these hateful years, thousands and thousands of noble men and women denounced the degradation and the crime. Most of their names are unknown. They hav given a glory to obscurity. They hav filled oblivion with honor. I would like to-night to name some of the men who hav fought for the liberty we enjoy; but I should want to name all. I hav the same honor and gratitude for the private whose record is summed up, "25 dead, 70 missing," as I hav for the plumed leader of the mighty host.

In the presence of death it has been the custom to speak of the worthlessness and the vanity of life. I prefer to speak of its value, of its importance, of its nobility and glory.

Life is not merely a floating shadow, a momentary spark, a dream that vanishes. Nothing can be grander than a life filled with great and noble thoughts, with brave and honest deeds. Such a life sheds light, and the seeds of truth sown by great and loyal men bear fruit through all the years to be. To hav lived and labored and died for the right—nothing can be sublimer.

History is but the merest outline of the exceptional—of a few great crimes, calamities, wars, mistakes, and dramatic virtues. A few mountain peaks are touched, while all the valleys of human life, where countless victories are won, where labor wrought with love, are left in the eternal shadow.

But these peaks are not the foundation of nations. The forgotten words, the unrecorded deeds, the unknown sacrifices, the heroism, the industry, the patience, the love and labor, of the nameless good and great hav for the most part founded, guided, and defended states. The world has been civilized by the unregarded poor, by the untitled nobles, by the uncrowned kings, who sleep in unknown graves mingled with the common dust.

They hav thought and wrought—hav borne the burdens of the world. The pain and labor hav been theirs—the glory has been given to the few.

The conflict came. The South unsheathed the sword. Then rose the embattled North; and these men who sleep to-night beneath the flowers of half the world gave all for us.

They gave us a nation—a republic without a slave—a republic that is sovereign, and to whose will every citizen and every state must bow. They gave us a Constitution for all, one that can be read without shame and defended without dishonor. They freed the brain, the lips, and hands of men.

All that could be done by force was done. All that could be accomplished by the adoption of constitutions was done. The rest is left to education, the innumerable influences of civilization, to the development of the intellect, to the cultivation of the heart and the imagination. The past is now a hideous dream. The present is filled with pride, with gratitude and hope.

Liberty is the condition of real progress. The freeman works for wife and child; the slave toils from fear. Liberty gives leisure, and leisure refines, beautifies, and ennobles. Slavery gives idleness, and idleness degrades, deforms, and brutalizes.

Liberty and slavery—the right and wrong, the joy and grief, the day and night, the glory and the gloom, of all the years.

Liberty is the word that all the good hav spoken. It is the hope of every loving heart, the spark and flame in every noble breast, the gem in every splendid soul, the many-colored dream in every honest brain.

This word has filled the dungeon with its holy light, has put the halo round the martyr's head, has raised the convict far above the king, and clad even the scaffold with a glory that dimmed and darkened every throne.

To the wise man, to the wise nation, the mistakes of the past are the torches of the present. The war is over. The institution that caused it has perished. The prejudices that fanned the flames are only ashes now. We are one people. We will stand or fall together. At last with clear eyes we see that the triumph of right was a triumph for all. Together we reap the fruits of the great victory. We are all conquerors. Around the graves of the heroes—North and South, white and colored—together we stand, and with uncovered heads reverently thank the saviors of our nativ land.

We are now far enough away from the conflict—from its hatreds, its passions, its follies, and its glories—to fairly and philosophically examin the causes, and in some measure, at least, to appreciate the results.

States and nations, like individuals, do as they must. Back of revolution, of rebellion, of slavery and freedom, are the efficient causes. Knowing this, we occupy that serene hight from which it is possible to calmly pronounce a judgment upon the past.

We know now that the seeds of our war were sown hundreds and thousands of years ago—sown by the vicious and the just, by prince and peasant, by king and slave, by all the virtues and by all the vices, by all the victories and all the defeats, by all the labor and the love, the loss and gain, by all the evil and the good, and by all the heroes of the world.

Of the great conflict we remember only its glory and its lessons. We remember only the heroes who made the republic the first of nations, and who laid the foundation for the freedom of mankind.

This will be known as the century of freedom. Slowly the hosts of darkness hav been driven back.

In 1808 England and the United States united for the suppression of the slave trade. The Netherlands joined in this holy work in 1818. France lent her aid in 1819, and Spain in 1820. In the same year the United States declared the traffic to be piracy, and in 1825 the same law was enacted by Great Britain. In 1826 Brazil agreed to suppress the traffic in human flesh. In 1833 England abolished slavery in the West Indies, and in 1843 in her East Indian possessions, giving liberty to more than twelve millions of slaves. In 1846 Sweden abolished slavery, and in 1848 it was abolished in the colonies of Denmark and France. In 1861 Alexander II., czar of all the Russias, emancipated the serfs, and on the 1st day of January, 1863, the shackles fell from millions of the citizens of this republic. This was accomplished by the heroes we remember to-day—this in accordance with the proclamation of emancipation signed by Lincoln, greatest of our mighty dead; Lincoln, the gentle and the just, and whose name will be known and honored to "the last syllable of recorded time." And this year, 1888, has been made blessed and memorable forever. In the vast empire of Brazil there stands no slave.

Let us hope that when the next century looks from the sacred portals of the East its light will only fall upon the faces of the free.

The past rises before me like a dream. Again we are in the great struggle for national life. We hear the sounds of preparation—the music of boisterous drums—the silver notes of heroic bugles. We see thousands of assemblages and hear the appeals of orators; we see the pale cheeks of women and the flushed faces of men, and in those assemblages we see all the dead whose dust we hav covered with flowers. We lose sight of them no more. We are with them when they enlist in the great army of freedom. We see them part with those they love. Some are walking for the last time in quiet, woody places with the maidens they adore. We hear the whisperings and the sweet vows of eternal love as they lingeringly part forever. Others are bending over cradles, kissing babes that are asleep. Some are receiving the blessings of old men. Some are parting with mothers who hold them and press them to their hearts again and again, and say nothing. Kisses and tears, tears and kisses—divine mingling of agony and love! And some are talking with wives, and endeavoring with brave words, spoken in the old tones, to drive from their hearts the awful fear. We see them part. We see the wife standing in the door with the babe in her arms—standing in the sunlight sobbing—at the turn of the road a hand waves—she answers by holding high in her loving arms the child. He is gone, and forever.

We see them all as they march proudly away under the flaunting flags, keeping time to the grand, wild music of war, marching down the streets of the great cities, through the towns and across the prairies, down to the fields of glory to do and to die for the eternal right.

We go with them, one and all. We are by their side on all the gory fields—in all the hospitals of pain—on all the weary marches. We stand guard with them in the wild storm and under the quiet stars. We are with them in ravines running with blood, in the furrows of old fields. We are with them between contending hosts, unable to move, wild with thirst, the life ebbing slowly away among the withering leaves. We see them pierced by balls and torn with shells, in the trenches by forts, and in the whirlwind of the charge, where men become iron, with nerves of steel. We are with them in the prisons of hatred and famin, but human speech can never tell what they endured.

We are at home when the news comes that they are dead. We see the maiden in the shadow of her first sorrow. We see the silvered head of the old man bowed with his last grief.

The past rises before us and we see four million of human beings governed by the lash; we see them bound hand and foot; we hear the strokes of cruel whips; we see the hounds tracking women through tangled swamps. We see babes sold from the breasts of mothers. Cruelty unspeakable! Outrage infinit!

Four million bodies in chains—four million souls in fetters. All the sacred relations of wife, mother, father, and child trampled beneath the brutal feet of might. And all this was done under our own beautiful banner of the free.

The past rises before us. We hear the roar and shriek of the bursting shell. The broken fetters fall. These heroes died. We look. Instead of slaves we see men, and women, and children. The wand of progress touches the auction-block, the slave-pen, the whipping post, and we see homes, and firesides, and school-houses, and books, and where all was want and crime and cruelty and fear we see the faces of the free.

These heroes are dead. They died for liberty—they died for us. They are at rest. They sleep in the land they made free, under the flag they rendered stainless, under the solemn pines, the sad hemlocks, the tearful willows, and the embracing vines. They sleep beneath the shadows of the clouds, careless alike of sunshine or of storm, each in the windowless palace of rest. Earth may run red with other wars—they are at peace. In the midst of battle, in the roar of conflict, they found the serenity of death. I hav one sentiment for soldiers living and dead—cheers for the living, tears for the dead.

A vision of the future rises:

I see our country filled with happy homes, with firesides of content—the foremost land of all the earth.

I see a world where thrones hav crumbled and where the kings are dust. The aristocracy of idleness has perished from the earth.

I see a world without a slave. Man at last is free. Nature's forces hav by science been enslaved. Lightning and light, wind and wave, frost and flame, and all the secret, subtle powers of earth and air are the tireless toilers for the human race.

I see a world at peace, adorned with every form of art, with music's myriad voices thrilled, while lips are rich with words of love and truth; a world in which no exile sighs, no prisoner mourns; a world on which the gibbet's shadow does not fall; a world where labor reaps its full reward; where work and worth go hand in hand; where the poor girl trying to win bread with the needle—the needle that has been called "the asp for the breast of the poor"—is not driven to the desperate choice of crime or death, suicide or shame.

I see a world without the beggar's outstretched palm, the miser's heartless, stony stare, the piteous wail of want, the livid lips of lies, the cruel eyes of scorn.

I see a race without disease of flesh or brain—shapely and fair—the married harmony of form and function, and as I look, life lengthens, joy deepens, love canopies the earth, and over all, in the great dome, shines the eternal star of human hope.

The Trouble at Liberal, Mo.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav been a student of the Freethought University for the greater part of the two years of its prosperous and, so far, successful existence. But Professor Leahy, who has made it what it is, has resigned, taking effect June 16, 288, and I wish to lay before your many readers some of the causes that brought about that resignation. When the University was first founded, it unfurled a banner bearing the inscriptions, "Human Liberty," "The Freedom and Honor of the Student," and for eighteen months every bud blossomed with success. But the Prohibition and local option fever became prevalent, and Professor Leahy, whom all this time the students were watching to see whether he was a Materialist, Spiritualist, Anarchist, or what not, was called out in defense of the flag. The result was that it was soon found that he must giv up Paine, Ingersoll, Freethought, free speech, human liberty, and everything else, and be a Prohibitionist, to preside over the Freethought University. Then a few, most likely, policy people began to rave and rant on the popular side, and many unkind things were laid at the professor's door. He was accused of teaching "Anarchy," "free love," "Materialism," and "intemperance." Intemperance! I repeat it, I, for once in my life, wish there were a God to whom they had to account for this base falsehood. He was accused of thus contaminating the minds of the students, all of whom are old enough to hav, and do hav, minds of their own. Now, he was placed there, with hardly sufficient remuneration to bear his expenses, to defend liberty, "the liberty of man, woman, and child." Oh, how bravely he stood at his post, every fiber of his being thrilled with love, every pulse of his noble and tender heart beating for humanity!

Even when he saw some of his most powerful friends forsaking him, he never wavered, but still stood with his face to the foe, fighting for the cause he loved and was there to defend. What is his reward? He is forsaken, reproved; his management is criticised; he is considered at fault because he has gained the lasting love of each and every student. The Catholic colleges of the land are held up to him as a model—a model for the disciplin of a Freethought university. He refuses. Then he must go. A man is not allowed to think for himself; to speak his honest thoughts; to giv the world a new idea, the result of his midnight toil—no, no, he cannot do this and preside over a Freethought institution. He must either be dumb, or, upon all the great questions of the day, be on the popular side. There would hav been no objections had he advocated Prohibition, but to get rid of him was the question. He had many friends, and was the ideal of all, save a few who could not conceive the highest type of Freethought, or were opposed to higher education. The idea was to wait till the election of the new board of managers, then elect such persons as were opposed to Professor Leahy and his ideas. One man has said he actually hated Professor Leahy, and would use all his influence to keep him out of the school another year. Hated him, because he changed the opinions of his son, a young man of twenty-three years, that is, made a Secularist of him. This man, Mr. Editor, was elected to the new board. Another, whose daughter's tuition was paid by a benevolent gentleman, and who prevented her from studying by putting out her light, and finally taking her out of school, was elected to the board. Another man, who is opposed to higher education and has opposed the school since its inception, has been elected president of the board of managers. Some of them are not stockholders at all; and, again, they were not chosen by a long, deliberate, and critical examination, which seems necessary to the good management of the only Freethought institution in the world, but from a list presented by an avowed opponent of Professor Leahy. Now, does it seem that they are watchful of the interests of the institution? Now, did Professor Leahy get justice? I think not. He thinks not. He saw their object, and that he would be deposed, and so resigned to cheat them of their game. It seems to me that the future flag of the University will bear the inscriptions, "Catholic Disciplin," "Total Depravity of the Student."

Merely a Plain, Natural Fool.

From the Detroit Evening News of the 23d ult.

Senator Blair, of New Hampshire—famous for his bill to turn the Mississippi northward into Hudson bay; for his national educational bill; and for his scheme to declare the liquor traffic piracy on the high seas, and send out American men-of-war to attack and sink all ships of whatsoever nation which might be caught on the ocean with so much as a bottle of Bass's ale or a quart of Burgundy on board—has come forward with a new law as crazy as the others. He introduced it in the United States Senate yesterday. It is for the observance of the Lord's day—as the bill calls it—after the fashion of the Old Testament, prohibiting all games, play, recreation, or amusement; all mail carrying, transporting, handling, assorting, or distributing; all commerce between the states and Indian tribes. Blair can read, and he has probably read the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," but he may not understand what it means. People are not exactly agreed now as to what ails this man Blair. Some think that his mind has been impaired by the opium habit, but others believe that he is merely a plain, natural fool.

The Utility of Sermons.

From Kate Foote's Washington Letter to the Independent.

A lady who heard her friends saying that they disliked sermons and would like to banish them, especially from the Episcopal church service, cried out against them and their plan.

"Sermons! they are delightful; don't let them go."

"Do you ever listen?" said a surprised friend; so surprised that the question flew out of her mouth without the consent of her will.

"No," said the other, calmly; "but it is a quiet time—nobody can interrupt—the pews must not talk back, you know. I—lean back comfortably and plan all my bonnets. It is lovely for that, and your neighbors' bonnets are all round to offer suggestions. Pray, do not let sermons go."

The Truth Seeker As a Teacher.

From the Worthington, Minnesota, Advance.

The Cedar Rapids Republican has adopted the reform in spelling first introduced by D. M. Bennett in the New York Truth Seeker, that is, dropping the e from such words as have.

This is a very sensible reform.

By the way, the Advance has frequently urged upon the newspapers the propriety of a more general reform in spelling so as to shorten and simplify their work. The newspapers originate and bring into general use a good many words, and they hav it in their power to revolutionize the whole system of spelling.

From San Francisco Freethought.

Has the New York Independent been taking lessons of The Truth Seeker? It now spells though "tho," and drops the final e from domicile.

Religious Preferences of Political Candidates.

Religion appears to be entering into political matters to a greater extent this summer than it has since the Know-Nothing movement of a quarter of a century ago. But unlike that movement, which aimed to destroy the influence of Catholicism, the present revival of religious politics is directed against Atheism and those who are suspected of favoring that philosophy.

Secretary Stevens has called attention to the opposition to Mr. Fifer, Republican candidate for governor of Illinois, from the church folks on the sole ground that he is not orthodox in his religious views; and now the same charge is made a basis for opposition to Walter L. Gresham, of Indiana, a possible Republican candidate for the presidency. It seems that Mr. Fifer has for years been a friend and admirer of Colonel Ingersoll, as has his law partner, I. N. Phillips. Mr. Phillips, in the spring of 1883, was nominated by the Republicans for mayor of Bloomington, Ill., and was defeated in a town naturally of his political faith, simply because he was thought to be "a disciple of Ingersoll." After the election it was found that the religious element had talked the matter over in their churches and homes, and quietly knifed him at the polls. The opposition to Mr. Fifer is developing with rapidity, according to special dispatches to the Chicago Times. The Methodists are the most virulent. Several letters hav been received by clergymen at Bloomington, Mr. Fifer's home, from pious people of adjacent counties requesting information as to Mr. Fifer's religious belief. One letter is from a leading Republican of Macon county, who states emphatically that if Fifer is a disbeliever in the Christian faith in any form, shape, or manner he will not only vote against him, but work for his defeat with all the zeal and energy in his body. The questions uppermost in the Christian mind of Bloomington are: "Was Fifer ever baptized?" and "Does he believe in the Apostles' creed?" The correspondent of the Times says that the man who goes back on the Apostles' creed will be opposed by the entire Christian church, for every true Christian believes in it. The clergy are preparing papers on the subject of Atheistic politicians, and announcing their determination to oppose all heretics. What foundation there may be for the honor thus thrust upon Mr. Fifer we do not know. His church status is thus stated by the Chicago Times (a Democratic journal): "Since Joe has begun to figure for the governorship he has attended what is known in Bloomington as the 'Broadgauge' church, which was charged some years ago with haying thrown the Bible out of the window. A Bostonian who occupied the pulpit at the time made a most contemptible reference to the birth of our savior. The church was organized by Dr. Wakefield. He did not believe in the divinity of Christ. It has always been liberal in its views, with a leaning latterly toward Unitarianism. There was a time when the Unitarian church threatened to sever its 'Broadgauge' connection unless its ideas were modified."

The clergy are likewise paying close attention to Mr. Gresham's possible candidacy for president. The story has been widely circulated in this state that Judge Gresham is an Atheist, and Mr. R. W. Patterson, managing editor of the Chicago Tribune, has thought it wise to help Mr. Gresham's chances to beat Mr. Depew in the Republican convention by writing the following letter to the Albany Journal:

"Judge Gresham's parents were Methodists, and he attended the Methodist church at Danville, Ind., while a boy and before marriage. After marriage he attended the First Presbyterian church at New Albany and the Second Presbyterian church in Indianapolis. He is now a regular attendant upon Professor Swing's church in Chicago, and is in no sense an Atheist or an Infidel. While not an activ church-member, he is not an unbeliever, and has never said or done anything offensiv to church people. He has never made any public utterance in regard to his religious belief in private. He has said to his friends that he believes in a future life and in the existence of a supreme being, but probably he would not wish to be put on the stand for a rigid cross-examination as to what he believes and what he disbelieves, and would find it pretty difficult to make a categorical statement on the subject, as, like many of his countrymen, he inherits his religion from his mother and preserves it through his wife."

This tendency to drag religion into politics, and to make a man's piety a test for preferment, cannot be too strongly condemned. In a strictly secular government, a man's religion will never be asked. Character and ability will constitute his credentials. But that happy state is by no means at hand, and before it does arrive the religious war will hav to be fought out. In the present instance, the Protestants are the ones who hav brought the question forward, as a result of, and in harmony with, their policy of making this a "Christian country" by constitutional amendment. But Liberalism cannot be the loser if the contest over the governorship of Illinois, or even the presidency of the United States, turns upon religious opinions. The quicker the fight is upon us, the sooner will justice triumph, and a secular government be an assured fact instead of the ideal which it is now.

Let the ministers begin their battle of bigotry.

Converting the Jews.

In answer to the Independent's call upon Mr. A. Benjamin for proof that the association for the conversion of the Jews of this city is a spiritual humbug, and costing a great deal more than it is worth, that gentleman communicates to the Jewish Messenger a few of the charges he prefers against Mr. Freshman, the activ missionary of the society. The scheme, he intimates, is one for the personal aggrandizement of Mr. Freshman, who, while advertising that he and his wife "liv by faith" while doing the Lord's work among the Israelites, is really lecturing in Protestant churches for emoluments consisting of many dollars and cents. Mr. Benjamin charges also that Mr. Freshman makes no explanation of the manner in which he uses donations of money to the society. In 1882 Mr. Freshman claimed to be making converts at the rate of eight a week. In his fifth report, covering 1886–7, he can, however, count only seven converts for the year, while in the sixth report, covering 1887–8, he can find only six Jews who hav yielded to his eloquence. What these thirteen converts hav cost, no one knows.

Mr. Benjamin charges also that Mr. Freshman's converts are not permanent additions to the fold, but become Christians temporarily, and for revenue principally. He instances a certain "Mr. and Mrs. Feinstein, bakers by occupation, who, after being converted and receiving their boodle in return, resumed their old faith, for soon after their baptism a newly born male child was initiated in the Abrahamic covenant on Atonement day of 1883, and who are now full-fledged Jews in Scotland, Dak." Others of Mr. Freshman's converts are named, and inquiries as to their whereabouts made in a tone which implies that they will be found either in some state prison or foreign land. Indeed, it is strongly implied that all of the converts from Judaism to Christianity are of that class which makes their exit from the synagogs a "blessing in disguise," serving to purify "the camp of Israel of its refuse." Mr. Benjamin frankly avows his enmity toward Mr. Freshman, and offers to stake his reputation, his Judaism, or one thousand dollars in cash, that he can in one hour prove Mr. Freshman to be "the root of ignorance" of the Hebrew language, religion, and philosophy, and an unworthy missionary to be employed by the churches. He is, he says, determined to rescue Christianity from those who are degrading it. But we fancy, however, that his interest in Christianity is of a much milder form than his enmity to the society whose existence is an implication that the Jews are deserting the faith of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

If Howard Crosby and the other Protestant clergy of the Hebrew-Christian Society would put out a faithful report of the money received and expended by the society, and tell truly just how many Jews hav been bribed or coaxed into the church, a comparison of the society's work with the work of the London society and its results would be interesting. The London society has been in existence about sixty-five years, and last year spent nearly two hundred thousand dollars in missionary work and for salaries of the missionaries. Nearly ten thousand Bibles and New Testaments were given away to the Hebrews, together with over two hundred thousand books, tracts, and other publications. Yet the London society does not report the number of its converts! and there are only between three and four thousand Christian Hebrews in the whole world, including Mr. Freshman's thirteen converts. Really, the outlook is not hopeful, and we think with Mr. Benjamin that the results of money spent on Jews are not sufficiently great to justify the existence of the Jew-converting societies.

But let the investigation of Mr. Freshman and his methods and converts go on! The people who are supporting him deserve to know the facts.

An "Infidel-Smasher."

At the earnest request of a number of Freethinkers of Blakeslee, O., we print the subjoined communication. Mr. Streline livs in Edon, O., and is regarded there and thereabouts as an "Infidel-smasher." He has read, as we learn from his communication, THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 28th, in which we asked some questions of the Christians, promising to ask some more when they were answered. Mr. Streline has undertaken to satisfy us, and the following is the result. We should hav corrected his manuscript, and put his statements into intelligible shape, had his attention not been called to the flaws in his composition by some of his clerical friends, eliciting the response that "it was good enough for an Infidel sheet." Therefore it is printed as he wrote it, and the hope is entertained that the clergymen feel proud of their champion:

"EDON OHIO

"MR BENETET

"Editor TRUTH SEEKER in Reading your paper of Jan 28 you ask Sixteen questions for Some christian to answer.

"The most Important one is the 2d How can the Infinite be limited, and the Immortal Die.

"This question alone show's Infidel wit: because it is the mortal that dies & the Immortal lives when a man proffesses to be an Infidel he acknowledges himself to be a fool. for God says the fool has said in his heart there is no God

"Every man that says his soul is mortal, places himself on a level with the Brute creation and indeed he is not of as much value as the Brute to the human creation.

"If you denie the Immortality of the soul: pleas tell me the difference between yourself and a mule. the only difference I can see, you Bray louder than the mule especially through THE TROUTH SEEKER.

"You had better change the title of your paper and call it the Devil's Guide Board to Hell.

"The Christian are partakers of the divine nature of our Lord and Saviour Jesus the christ. this is that, that elevates above the Brute Creation. out of the old rusty Infidel Rut. Faith to the Christian is that. that looks through the dark gloomy grave into the paridise of God. where we hope to dewell throughout all ages with the one that Redeemmed us from sin

"Faith to the Infidel is that: that takes him to the grave where he Hopes to be forever Banished from the presence of the living God. where he will will return to dust Just as other anamals do.

"Now Remmember that Faith is the substance of things Hoped for the evedence of things not seen. Now every thing on the face of the earth. that has sence enough to hope: Hopes for a life beyond the grave:

"When Jesus acknowledged to be the son of God, the Jews took counsel to kill him. Now remmember that they were Infidel's After they crucified him: they placed a guard of Romman soldiers: and they were Infidels to: placed at the grave to wach that he was not stollen away: Jesus arose from the dead and when the soldiers found out he was not there. then they say that the disciples came and stole him away while they slept: and Infidels to day are soft Headed enough to believe such noncensicals lies as that: pretty guard to be found a sleep on duty weren't they: and if they were asleep How did they know that the Disciples stole him. A man that has as much Brains as a ratle snake could see the Inconsistant lies they told; Now then Jesus rasing from the

"Does Infidelity make the Dieing bed plesant and Happy. (Ask Tom Paine) if it does than Blow your bugal loudly

"Does Infidelity promice you any thing beyond this life if not than why are you an Infide.

"What can we say for Christianity.

"does it lead men to the saloons to make fools of themselves

F. SHELINE"

We are appealed to by the senders of this to "stoop just this once to answer this;" but we frankly confess that we are puzzled how to get hold of it. Shall we describe the anatomical differences existing between the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER and a mule, showing how our larynx is incapable of vocal competition with that useful but ridiculous animal; or shall we corner Mr. Streline by asking him how he is certain of so much that nobody else pretends to know? What reliable information does he possess concerning the immortal? Has he lived other lives, or is he acquainted with anyone who has? "It is the mortal that dies & the immortal livs." Exactly, barring the symbolic conjunction. We are willing to concede that anything which is immortal livs. The question is, what is immortal? The nearest approach to an immortal object—having a beginning—which we know of is the ignorance of Christians like Mr. Streline. That seems impenetrable and never-dying.

Really, we don't see what our Infidel-smasher has proved, or advanced any evidence to prove. He makes assertions, for all the world like more competent theologians, but forgets to adduce corroborativ testimony. What is the divine nature? How do the Christians get hold of it? What has "hope" to do with facts? A Mohammedan hopes to go to heaven and be surrounded with houris. Will he? A Buddhist hopes for nirvana, and his idea of heaven is extinction of consciousness. Will that be his condition after death, because he hopes for it? Then we get this quotation, delivered with solemn mien: "Now remember that Faith is the substance of things hoped for; the evidence of things not seen." Well, what of it? What does it prove? Only this, that Mr. Streline—who is a type of hundreds of thousands of Christians—has heard a minister quote it in an oracular manner, and being incapable of reasoning upon the matter has taken it for granted that it means a tremendous lot. Supposing a man has faith that in some other planet water runs up-hill, trees grow into the earth, and two and two make a hundred and five, is his faith evidence that it is so? Go to! Mr. Streline. Smash us with something else.

The resurrection argument, or the stone which wasn't at the door of the sepulcher, is the next weapon of offense. Let's put the argument into syllogistic form:

1. Christ was missing from the tomb.
2. Therefore he was raised from the dead.
3. Ergo, he was the son of God, and this proves the immortality of the soul.

Hurray! Can anything be neater, or more complete, or more conclusiv? Surely there has arisen in Ohio a logician of great power. But before we adopt the conclusion we desire to hav historical proof that a son of God was crucified, that he was put in a sepulcher, that his body disappeared, that he appeared to his followers, that he ascended into heaven. Does Mr. Streline know that the best Christian scholars of the world admit that the four gospels are not authentic, were not written by the men whose names they bear, nor at the time the unlearned Christians think they were? Before we can believe the resurrection myth, the accounts of it must be substantiated. Guesswork, tradition, faith, the dreams of credulity, the imaginings of ignorance, the statements of designing priests, cannot be taken as historical truth.

We may inform Mr. Streline that Thomas Paine died calmly, peacefully, and without crying out, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" and that Infidelity makes men better by teaching them to hav regard for their lives here in this world. We may also inform him that the patrons of saloons are mostly Christians; that about all the murderers are religious, and that Christianity pretends to be able to get them into heaven; that a good many horse-thieves hav been pious; that ninety-nine of every hundred convicts in the penitentiaries are professing Christians; that a good many unhappy families are caused by the Christian religion; that a good many religious fanatics hav been reduced to penury by their "devotion to the Lord."

We are willing to take all the consequences of our present conduct, assuring Mr. Streline that we do not believe a good God would make us so that we cannot do otherwise than as we do and then burn us forever for doing it.

Twaddle.

The Messenger of Truth, a religious periodical, quotes approvingly this paragraph from John Ruskin:

"God is a kind father. He sets us all in the places where he wishes us to be employed; and that employment is truly 'our father's business.' He chooses work for every creature which will be delightful to them, if they do it simply and humbly. He givs us always strength enough, and sense enough, for what he wants us to do; if we either tire ourselvs or puzzle ourselvs, it is our own fault. And we may always be sure, whatever we are doing, that we cannot be pleasing him if we are not happy ourselvs."

We wonder if God sets the editors of Freethought papers at their employment? Was it his wish that D. M. Bennett, for instance, should begin the publication of THE TRUTH SEEKER? And are we doing our "father's business" in continuing Mr. Bennett's work, delightful and inspiring though it may be? Does the happiness a Freethought writer or lecturer derives from his labor of breaking mental chains argue that such labor is pleasing God? Does God really giv the iconoclasts the wit and ability they use in destroying the superstitious belief in a God or gods?

When you come down to bottom facts, what twaddle the Christian talks!

Who They Are.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 26th we inquired if anyone knew "Hon. Charles F. Caldwell," of Parkersburg, W. Va., who was said to be a "famous Infidel," known as "the Ingersoll of the West Virginia bar," and "the Rev. James A. Merryman," for twenty years an Infidel, and "intimate friend of Colonel Ingersoll," both of whom are alleged to hav been recently converted to Christianity. Mr. Warner Lovell, of Des Moines, Iowa, writes:

"I hav recalled to mind the 'famous' Caldwell and notorious Merriman. Caldwell is a slugger, according to the sporting record, and Merriman won first money at a walking match of six nights' duration in Des Moines last winter. I make no charge for this information, but as you advertise to know 'Who Are They?' I thought I would endeavor to giv you the desired information. WARNER LOVELL."

Does anybody else know who they are?

Editorial Notes.

WE print elsewhere copious passages from Colonel Ingersoll's reply to Mr. Gladstone's criticisms of himself. The article occupies some forty pages of the North American Review for June, and the balance is as good as the extracts we quote. The Review containing it will be supplied from this office for fifty cents.

SALADIN reprints in the Secular Review the excerpts from Mr. Gladstone's attack upon Colonel Ingersoll made in these columns, together with our comments thereupon, which he calls "an able article." This is flattering indeed; but what we want to see is Saladin's funeral sermon over Gladstone's effort when he reads Colonel Ingersoll's answer.

THE general synod of the Reformed Presbyterian church adopted a resolution last week reaffirming their convic tion that the Constitution of the United States is a virtual agreement or compact to administer the government without reference to Christ or the Christian religion, and that incorporation with the government on the basis of this Constitution is, therefore, an act of disloyalty to Christ. This is a legally correct estimate of the relations between the national government and the churches, as contemplated by the founders of the republic, but practically the matter is very different. Except in legal technicalities the churches are as well "established" in this country as in England, and they manage to filch from the national money-box and the various state treasuries about as much cash for their support. The Reformed Presbyterians are too finicky in their loyalty to Christ!

ELDER JAMES QUINTEX, editor of the Gospel Messenger, dropped dead one afternoon while offering praver at the national conference of the German Baptist (Dunkard) church, near Wabash, Ind. He had been editor of the Gospel Messenger more than twenty years. This will do to go with the Seneca blasphemy incident, wherein the blasphemer was suddenly stricken insane; for if the moral of the one is, Don't blaspheme, the moral of the other is, Don't pray.

THE Rev. G. M. Colville, of Binghamton, N. Y., approached dangerously near to plagiarism in his memorial sermon at the gathering of the Grand Army of the Republic of his city. One of his paragraphs reads:

"The past rises before me. I see four millions of human beings governed by the rod. I see bloodhounds pursuing them into the depths of the dismal swamp. I see babes torn from their mothers at the auction-block. Oh, cruelty unspeakable, and all under our flag! Now, instead of slaves, I see free men, women, and children. Thank God, the heroes did not die in vain!"

This is a very clumsy imitation of Colonel Ingersoll's "Vision of War," which he gave at a soldiers' reunion in Indianapolis in 1876, and which he quotes in the Decoration Day oration printed in this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Ministers who use Colonel Ingersoll's ideas and language ought at least to giv credit for them.

THE C. R. Bennett who figures in the Oakland Enquirer's report of a Freethought lecture in that place as the champion of Clark Braden, the theological polecat, is the agent of the San Francisco Society for the Suppression of Vice, the Anthony Comstock of the Pacific coast. It is a choice companionship. Braden is meeting with poor success in his challenges. He used the Christians of Phœnix, Ariz., as catspaws, hoping by a trick to secure a debate with C. B. Reynolds, but the Liberals demanded the name of their opponent before getting Mr. Reynolds to revisit the town, on learning which the debate was declared off, as Mr. Reynolds refused to meet Braden on any terms. Braden will hav no better success with Mr. Putnam, and we advise him to retire into that obscurity which will so become a man of his shady reputation. The less he is heard the better he will be thought of.

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S Decoration Day oration teaches lessons that it would be well for all political parties as well as for the pietists to learn. Liberty, liberty, liberty! is the current flowing strongly through its expanse of flowery rhetoric. Every matchless period emphasizes the speaker's desire and demand for liberty, justice, equality. Liberty secured to all, justice for everyone, and equality the natural condition of men and women. If Colonel Ingersoll will only occasionally allow his voice to be heard for a few years more, the people in this region, at least, will hav some idea of freedom. Amid the music and flowers and gay mourning of the memorial service—the "joyful celebration of magnificent recollections"—this speech was "like the lily with its heart of fire," the fairest flower in all the wealth of blossoms. In quotation, even, the orator could only match himself with himself. The audience received the speech with applause and tears, and showed that in almost every heart the good is uppermost by going frantic with enthusiastic appreciation of the picture of the future republic. The Minneapolis Tribune will hav to revise its opinion that Colonel Ingersoll is hampered in his career by his religious opinions. He is the most sought-after orator in New York, and is fast becoming the most popular man.

Mr. Talmage is a Joke.

From Fa r Play.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, after quoting some of Talmage's ravings and declining to comment seriously upon them, says: "Talmage is a joke." That is true, and it is doubtful if he means to be anything but the clown or the acrobat of the pulpit. His mountebankism and misrepresentation bring him notoriety and ducats, and what more could any sensational preacher wish? Inductiv reasoning, the truths of history, and fair treatment of those from whom he differs are things with which he wants nothing to do. Let him alone, let him perform his marvelous feats of mouth and limb in the theological sawdust ring; until he says something serious and in a manner to convince us that he is not merely performing on the tight rope of calumny for his own amusement and profit, men and women of purpose and work hav precious little time to waste upon him.

Preaching is Labor.

From Life.

Last of all, says Life, Satan came also, as our pious brethren are inclined to believe, and induced Judge Wallace to decide in the case of the Rev. E. Walpole Warren, who was imported from England to supply a pulpit in this city, that clergymen come under the law forbidding the importation of laborers whose services are contracted for in a foreign country. We are inclined to think that Judge Wallace's decision was complimentary to the cloth, rather than otherwise. Scoffers contend that the average city clergyman does very little work in return for the large salaries that most of them are paid; whereas, according to holy writ, every clergyman should be distinctly a laborer in the vineyard of his master. If Judge Wallace had based his decision on the precedents established in the Rev. E. Walpole Warren's book of books, he could not hav come to any other conclusion than that the clergyman was a laborer; and that being established, according to our statutes his importation under contract is an infringement of the law that must meet the penalty.

Letters from Friends.

STOCKTON, MO., May 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5. I send you the name of S. S. Gilmore as a new subscriber. He is a young man; is a Freethinker, and has been for several years, but never subscribed for any Freethought paper until now. I am sure he will never do without your paper after reading it for one year, and of course that is the kind of a subscriber you want. I want to do all I can to get more people to read a good paper like yours, and drop their old superstitious ideas and do right for right's sake, not because they fear an imaginary God, of whose existence they hav no proof. C. H. MACK.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., May 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav heard a number say we must nominate R. G. Ingersoll for president of the United States. I would say to all such that we need him for other purposes. He already occupies a position higher than president of the United States. He and the principles he advocates must necessarily make him president of the world. Let us take his principles and organize in every place, and I will guarantee the world will accept them for all truth. How any person can see otherwise I cannot understand. What orthodoxy has been to other nations, that it would, if it could, be to us. By their fruit ye shall know them.

CHARLES SACH.

MONTESANO, WASH. TERR., May 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: There is great excitement among the Liberals here on account of Mr. C. B. Reynolds, the Liberal lecturer, being expected here. I got money enough together before I wrote him to come here. In this village are only a few outspoken Liberals. There are several Liberals that would not let it be known; they go to church, belong to the church, and, as most of them do there, act like monkeys. We can hardly wait until the lecturer comes and givs us good teaching. Please send me four more ALMANACS for 1888, and three copies of the "Argument by R. G. Ingersoll in the trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy"

Yours truly, W. WEDEKEN.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., May 6. 288.

MR. EDITOR: We suggest that Col. R. G. Ingersoll be run for Congress as an Independent candidate in the district in which he resides. England has her Ingersoll in Parliament, and ought we not to make a continual endeavor to get our Bradlaugh in Congress? And if we had the determination of a Bradlaugh we would get him there, too. There is nothing to hinder any person in any part of the United States from contributing to a campaign fund for the above purpose, and if we should succeed, we know by Bradlaugh's experience that the battle would be more than half won. Such an effort would at least "make Rome [and her children] howl." This would hav a wonderful effect in agitating our cause.

Let agitation come! Who fears?
The filth of years has gathered round us—
Roll, then, on! What cannot stand had best begone.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

PRINCETON, KAN., May 16. 288.

MR. EDITOR: As life is short, I take this opportunity of saying that THE TRUTH SEEKER suits me in every particular, and my hearty thanks are due to everyone connected with it, even down to the very devil. O brother! it has been a great source of delight to this old body and mind. I cannot do without it. How I wish I was able to thank in person everyone who contributes to its columns! I am a poor, old, ignorant man, but I am not unmindful of the obligation I am under to those noble men and women who giv us such noble sentiments in THE TRUTH SEEKER. How I should like to thank them in person! May they be blessed!

Eugene, I liv in one of the most ignorant, intolerant, bigoted, superstitious neighborhoods anywhere. I hav made the acquaintance of Mr. Frazer, of Ottawa, eight miles off, and he is the only Freethinker I know of in this whole region. I am much pleased with the ANNUAL for 1888. And as to Brother Heston, he is a brick. May his shadow never grow less!

I. P. MARTIN.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., May 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I believe Colonel Ingersoll is the most misunderstood man in the world to-day. And is it not strange? He condenses and simplifies the eloquent truths he utters until it would seem that a child could comprehend them. But for lack of comprehension the thoroughly orthodox are peerless.

Evidently the gentleman at the Nineteenth Century Club did not comprehend Mr. Ingersoll. How many times must he reiterate that it is not the thought, but the action, for which we are accountable? Perhaps I do not grasp the gentlemen's meaning, but it seems to me that they do not make nice distinctions between thought and action. How can we control that of which we are not possessed? Thoughts flit through the brain with the freedom of the wild bird in air. Some we would hold and imprison; some we would not entertain; but when both, uninvited, make a guest-chamber of the brain, what remains but to control the action?

Mr. Coudert is so exercised about the tearing-down process which Mr. Ingersoll has been carrying on so successfully that he is perfectly oblivious to his building ability. Fortunate indeed are we that a man livs who can tear down the structures reared by superstition and supported by ignorance. Mr. Coudert says: "What most ardent admirer will say that Colonel Ingersoll has built up anything?" His most ardent admirers know that structures such as Colonel Ingersoll has laid the foundation for are not completed in one man's lifetime. But when our children and our children's children in years to come hav reared upon that foundation the structure whose imperishable walls shall overtop all tyranny and creeds, when universal mental liberty shall be the watchword on its towers, then will the world do homage to the memory of R. G. Ingersoll, the greatest defender of human rights, the greatest champion of human liberty, the world ever saw.

MRS. J. B. PUFFER.

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., May 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished reading Aunt Elmina's "Little Lessons," and find that the grown-up children can learn something from it. I got it for a birthday present for my only grandchild, and am sure nothing could please her more. Liberals who hav no little ones of their own surely hav a niece, nephew, cousin, or grandchild who would be made better by reading this little gem. There are many whose birthdays will intervene between now and the winter holidays whose hearts would rejoice with this book for a gift.

Our children read her story of "The Darwins" years ago when it first came out in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I remember yet how delighted they were with it. They could scarcely wait for the mail that brought the paper. But it is in book form now, and is just as entertaining as ever. I hav sent for "The Darwins" and "The Infidel School-teacher" to send to a distant friend. When you are reading anything of Elmina's you feel as though she were near you, and not as though she lived on some far-off planet. She makes you feel at home as much as though you were with her in her little sitting-room at Snowville, Va. Be sure and write to her for one or all of her books.

EQUESTRIA, TEX., May 14, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: There is a wrong here in Texas that some abler man than I should show up. The landowners, land agents, bankers, and railroads are raising large sums of money to send back to the states to boom Texas. I will say for a truth that there is not one farmer out of seven but has a mortgage or a vendor's lien on his land. Besides, labor is begging employment. There are hundreds not able to pay taxes, while the bank is overrun loaning at two per cent per month.

The Union Labor party is causing some little alarm among the old Democrats. To prove to you and everyone that the Democratic party will not do, I refer them to the only fully Democratic law-making body that ever existed in the United States. That was at Richmond, Va., and Montgomery, Ala. If I remember rightly, it was Democratic from doorkeeper to president. Here are the laws it enacted in favor of labor—and let every poor man recollect this when he goes to vote: All those who owned mills or machinery were exempted. All those who owned five hundred sheep, five hundred head of cattle, one hundred head of horses, or five negroes were exempted. But everyone who had a wife and from one to ten children, and a hut at the back side of a negro plantation, without clothes or provisions, was forced by conscription to go in service for three years, or during the war. This is a full-blooded Democrat move for the poor laborer.

Let Mr. Heston keep the monkey. He is a fair representativ of the negro in the South thirty or thirty-five years ago.

Mr. Reynolds's account of Kansas is a correct account of Texas.

I was a subscriber for the fund to carry D. M. Bennett around the world. I hav the three volumes of his Travels. I shall soon send for the fourth.

MR. EDITOR: "Freedom shrieked when Kosciusco fell." The little sheet edited at Antioch, Cal., in the interest of woman's rights and kindred affiliations is in great travail over an article which was written for Putnam and Macdonald's Freethought, but was not printed by that firm, and was handed to the editor of the Antioch paper and printed—a part of it. I will not repeat the agonizing howl the editor renders up, but will say, only in kindness, a marked copy of Foundation Principles, a paper edited at Antioch, Cal., is before me, and my reply is: Many thanks! You will notice, the more venomous the reptil, when disturbed the livelier contortions. Facts are stubborn things. In regard to "braying of long-eared minstrels," you must remember there are one hundred mules of the feminin gender to one jack; also, bear in mind that an estimate of caliber from your own standpoint is hardly a fair measure for myself. Now, in regard to Putnam and Macdonald's not publishing my effusion, I don't know if your statement be true or not, neither do I care. As I know purity does not accompany any such doctrin as Heywood's or any other paper advocating indiscriminate blending of principles, the comments concerning my article fall flat. The tone of the paper is Anarchical, and tends to distortion of morals. If you are endowed with such herculean intellect as you seem to attribute to yourself, you could do better in some other direction. As to the discrepancy between a four and eight page paper of the Lilliputian dimensions of the Antioch sheet, it is hardly perceptible, and should not worry so profound a source. My dear fellow-mortal, I hav unbounded sympathy for the suffering of all animated matter, whether animal or human, but hav no admiration for distorters of truth or disturbers of good morals and good government. No man living has a more profound regard for Liberalism than myself, or a more true respect for morality. The martyred Bennett, the founder of the Liberal doctrin enunciated to-day, has no more true adherent to the truthful sentiments embodied therein. The means which were inaugurated to persecute the hero who circumnavigated the globe in the interest of truth and science will some day recoil upon the perpetrators, in my opinion. D. M. Bennett was the greatest disseminator of Liberal truths of his time. As a devotee of Anarchy said in regard to the misguided cranks of Chicago, "Hats off," I feel like saying, Hats off for the noble Bennett!

MR. EDITOR: In an article from Elba, printed April 21st, appears the expression: "The preacher was repeating the story of Ingersoll's daughter joining the Presbyterian church." I am informed that it was not the intention to mention any names in that article, but as the Methodist preacher here, a Mr. Pettay, was the one meant in the paragraph immediately preceding, the use of "the" instead of "a" was an error and escaped the notice of "Agnostic." It is a very common occurrence for Methodist preachers to make use of similar falsehoods invented by orthodoxy, and they usually peddle out their stock in trade without the semblance of a blush, but I am glad to say we hav an orthodox preacher here who objects to being quoted as authority for this particular falsehood. "Agnostic" requests me to correct the error, which I cheerfully do. However, the story was told by a preacher in Mr. Pettay's presence and he had no word of rebuke at the time. His attempt to make capital out of so slight an error is simply catching at a straw, and his motiv well understood. Mr. Pettay does not seem to be so prompt in publicly correcting his own public statements which hav no foundation in fact. His statement that I acknowledged that I lied is simply false, and he dare not make an explanation in print.

Mr. J. E. Remsburg delivered two lectures at Lower Salem and one here, which were the first of the kind ever delivered near here. Those who engaged Mr. Remsburg hav reason to feel proud of their success, as it was much better than expected, and this explains why some people—preachers, for instance—catch at straws. The preacher here had special business out of town when Mr. Remsburg came. Preachers are paid by the year to defend their doctrins, but they dare not do it when their opponents hav any possible chance to be heard.

Respectfully, W. J. DUTTON.

BLOOK, KAN., April 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Since I wrote my last letter to you, I hav received a copy or two of nearly every paper of Liberal tendencies that is published in the United States, also a copy of Secular Thought, and let me say that for live editors, for good thinkers, for witty and sarcastic writers and debaters, I do not think the same number of papers representing any other cause will equal those representing the Liberal cause. While some of the papers hav been free love and others hav been Anarchistic, and some hav been labor papers, they hav all been carefully read, and distributed where I thought the most good would be done; but let me say that I liv in a settlement where the people are either Liberals or Lutherans. There is quite a flock of each, and it seems as though the lines are drawn so that but little advance in numbers can be made by either. The Lutherans hav a $6.000 church away out here, ten miles from a town of any size, so you may know they are pretty strong, and it is just as hard to penetrate their heads with a new idea as it is with the same number of Catholics. In fact, the difference between the Catholics and the Lutherans is only in the degree, not in the kind, and the Lutherans are only one degree behind the Catholics.

If there are any truly Liberal papers published in the German language, and some of the publishers of such papers will send me copies. I will gladly distribute them where they will do the most good.

I like the Liberal cause, and do all I can for it. If I were able, I would take every paper published in the interests of that cause, for I believe the newspapers are the general educators, so of course the more Liberal papers the better. Wishing success to all, and hoping for a future as bright as only S. P. Putnam can picture it, I remain,

Yours truly, W. A. LOWE.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., May 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: We hav been having a course of lectures by Prof. J. S. Loveland in our city upon Liberal subjects that gave universal satisfaction. Many of your readers may remember that Professor Loveland was one of the early workers in the cause of mental freedom thirty and forty years ago in the city of Boston and other Eastern cities. He now hails from California, and is president of the Mount Pleasant park camp-meeting at Clinton, Ia., the only one in the country that maintains a free platform practically. And here let me say that any person that will take the trouble to spend a few weeks or a few days at this camp cannot help being instructed and interested.

Dr. Juliet H. Severance, whom many of your readers may be interested in, has just returned from the Union Labor convention at Cincinnati, where she was sent as a delegate at large from this state, and she considers that a good work was done in the cause of labor reform. She has lately been on a trip lecturing in the northern part of the state. She lectures on a great variety of subjects, and all of her work is in the best interest of the people as she understands it. Our city is as free from priestly rule as any you can find in this country. There are as many churches here as anywhere, but they do not hav the same control over the people. Sunday is like a holiday here. People go to church, and then to picnics, hav three or four ball games, and horse-races, dances, etc. Our Sunday laws are as stringent as the most conservativ could wish, but they cannot enforce them, so they stand as a dead letter upon our statute books. Over half of the population are Germans, and a large share of them are very Liberal and hold a balance of power Liberally. They hav a large society of Freethinkers called "Freide Gemeinde." Then, our labor organizations help to Liberalize the people, although a large share of them are members of the different churches, but they find they cannot serve their own cause of labor and the church at the same time and be faithful to both. We do not hav any speakers like Dr. McGlynn here that tell them that they can be good Catholics or Protestants and work successfully against all the monopolies, for the church monopoly is one of the worst in the land. While there is not any open attack made upon the church in the labor movement, the church stands or falls with the rest of the monopolies. The principle of equality of the race can never exist as long as the Christian church maintains its present power in the land. The cause of human freedom and the church are in utter opposition to each other, and always hav been. More and more people are beginning to find this out, and I hope there will be more cities and towns like our own where people can hav more freedom of thought or action. And all hail the day when we shall hav universal mental freedom throughout the land! A. B. SEVERANCE.

PROSPECT, PA., May 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: My copy is, as far as I know, the only one that comes to Prospect, which is a town noted for its deep and fervent piety. My humble self, however, does not take any stock in religion, for these reasons: first, because there are so many, each claiming to be the only true one, that with the great mass of mankind it is only a question of where they are born as to what their religion is; second, our particular religion is founded on the belief that the Bible is the word of a God who made this world and its inhabitants in six days, but this Bible is full of errors which prove that it is not the work of the architect of the universe, but the work of man in an ignorant and barbarous age. The science of geology proves that the world was not made in six days, six thousand years ago, but that it is millions of years old, and the same agencies that made it are yet at work. The Bible says Joshua commanded the sun to stand still; the science of astronomy proves that it always stood still. In the New Testament it is miracle upon miracle. You are commanded to love your enemies and hate your friends. And St. Mark xvi, 15–18, proves either that there is not a particle of faith in the world or the promis is worth nothing. When I giv these reasons in argument the pious cannot answer them, but say they are sorry for me; that I'll find out some day, etc.

And now, Mr. Editor, and friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER family, I hav a little favor to ăsk. I am a young man of twenty-five years, unmarried, and hav a common school education. I intend to devote a few years, if I liv, to gathering together a little property, which at present I am lacking. I wish to do this by honest labor—fairly paid, which it is not in this section. If any reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER knows of any place where a man can obtain steady work and good wages, and will let me know, I will be greatly obliged. E. MOCANDLESS.

DES MOINES, IA., April 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I myself carried about my TRUTH SEEKER that contained the article, "Straws Show Which Way the Wind Blows," to get the article republished. I first went to the state Register, the state mouthpiece of the Republican party. The editor said the priest must hav been drunk, but when I asked him if he would publish it he said No, the Catholics would get mad. I then tried the evening News, another Republican paper. Then, by invitation of the editor of the Grand Army of the Republic, I sent the article to him, as he said he would publish it with comments. I waited a week, and his paper came out, but not a word about the tearing of the stars and stripes from the coffin of a dead comrade. The editor then sent me word it would not do to attack the church, but he would annihilate that impudent priest in next week's issue. I waited for that, but, alas! nothing said. This editor is also a Republican, and could not afford to resent the insult offered to the flag of his country and a dead comrade, for it would kill the dear Republican party. I then was told that there was a paper in the city published by the Rev. Elder Lucas, who would dare slap that priest, as it was in his line of business to differ with Catholicism, and he is always ready for a debate. This was an insult to America, her flag, and to his dead comrade, for the reverend was with the boys in blue, and was a leading member of the G.A.R. We expected that he would send the priest to Andersonville prison anyway. But no; this sky-pilot, too, is a Republican; and the Catholic priest with impunity has given our country a greater insult than was given by the rebels firing on Fort Sumter, for which insult millions lost their lives. Who was it said, Shoot the scoundrel who would molest the flag?

Oh, yes, I had forgotten—this reverend once showed fight to Brother Watts, of Toronto, Canada. The fighting Watts accepted, and he sent his acceptance. But the reverend failed to materialize.

They hav been exhibiting on canvas in the Baptist church of this city "Christ Before Pilate." It drew twenty-five cents for admission. It took money out of the dupes' pockets. Of course, the sky-pilots stood in. But the poor city got nothing. They were allowed to run the museum without license. PAUL KENNEDY.

WOODHULL, ILL., May 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Talmage said recently: "The Lord almighty, in a score of passages which I hav not now time to mention, utters his indignation against all this family of delusions. After that be a Spiritualist if you dare."

Brother Talmage, I think you hav lately been barking up the wrong bush. In your sermon on Spiritualism you utter many deliberate falsehoods. You put up a man of straw and strike right and left regardless of whom you hit.

Now allow me to quote from the Bible: "No one has ever seen God or heard his voice." Now, how dare anyone say he said so and so? You will say, "They were inspired." Now, I would not giv six and one-quarter cents for the inspiration of any person. Some persons are shrewd, and good at guessing, but that is all.

If people would only giv up imagination, the earth could soon be made to "blossom as the rose."

The idea that Spiritualism is a religion is worse than foolishness. Nobody ever claimed it was. No one has the power to call up the dead; and what is more, no one ever did hav. So you see that little tale about Samuel is nothing but a romance.

There are just as many spiritual manifestations now as ever there were; but, for obvious reasons, people keep them secret.

A man must be blind indeed if he has not discovered that man is composed of two elements—good and evil. The flesh is evil and senseless; the spirit is intelligent, good, and pure. A blind man could see that it is not a person's spirit that needs looking after, but his body. God is mighty, and is able to manage his affairs in his own way without the interference of man. MRS. B. BURGESS.

PHENIX, ARIZ., May 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: On the arrival of THE TRUTH SEEKER every week every Liberal-minded citizen of this place that is so fortunate as to read its columns rejoices in the work it is doing for the enslaved minds of poor humanity. The sledge-hammer blows of your editorials and your correspondents, and, last but not the least, Watson Heston's caricatures, are heavy on the clergy.

Clark Braden is now with us, and has been for the last ten days trying to explain the Bible. One evening he appeared on the rostrum as an advocate of Solomon. He started out by saying that the Bible does not teach polygamy. Next, that his mother, God bless her, had died with the Bible by the side of her head, and she believed it to be a work of inspiration; that he did, too, and any Infidel, Freethinker, or other person who says differently is an infamous scoundrel. The Freethinkers of this place all agree that it is the best argument in favor of Solomon's actions they ever heard, but not quite satisfactory to the Liberal mind, that God guided and directed Solomon in his wicked works. Arizonians know something about polygamy, and a man of Clark Braden's caliber cannot defend that book against the charge of polygamy with one of the Mormon elders in this county—and there are many of them. Again, he says the Bible does not teach the enslavement of the human family, and givs as his reason: "My mother believed it to be an inspired book, and so do I, Ingersoll to the contrary notwithstanding, and any man who says differently is a vile, dirty villain;" and other language such as is sometimes used about bar-rooms, but seldom, however. Every evening he has a different subject, and the principal part of the lecture is the abuse of Ingersoll and all Freethinkers. The language he uses is some that he has manufactured for this particular occasion, and I will say that it is the most vile language ever used in this city. It is used in a church, under the sanction of the churches of this place. He winds up by saying, "My mother was a Christian and a devout woman, and she believed it to be a work of inspiration, and I do." He has used his mother so often in his arguments that it has become a by-word on the streets, and now it is customary in order to convince a man on any subject just to use Clark Braden's argument, "My mother believes it," and you gain your point every time. I hav given this thing too much notice, and I hope you will excuse me for it; but there is one thing I want to say before I close: there are more Infidels in Phenix than ever before, and some of them came out of the church. I think if Clark Braden would stop a month with us our ranks would fill up fast. He is doing us no harm, and I only hope he will keep on. A FREETHINKER.

AXTELL, KAN., May 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: C. B. Reynolds and the other blizzard came to Kansas and are gone. One would think that mortgages, ague, and blizzards hav full possession of Kansas, if one were to take Mr. Reynolds's word for it, and that we "only raise one crop in three years." I came to Kansas first in 1866; hav been in Fall River, and most of the eastern part of the state. I know that we hav no worse storms than they hav in Oswego county, New York, and not near so frequent, and that we hav not half so many cases of ague. I am now marketing corn at forty cents a bushel that pays me $12 an acre, and I can show a man land fully as good that can be bought at that price. We are in debt, but so are the farmers of Indiana, Michigan, and other states. I hav lived in several of the Middle states, and can truthfully say that any man with $1,000 to $5,000 can locate himself far better here than in any place east of the Mississippi river. I am a farmer, and hav no lands for speculation. I write this so as to try to undo the harm that Reynolds's articles were calculated to do to the poor man in Kansas that must find buyers or lose everything.

I was greatly interested in Van Buren Denslow's articles on the "Distribution of Wealth." I had never before read so plausible a defense of monopoly. The only objection to his conclusions is that they are all false. He said that "large owners of land rented cheaper than small owners." We hav the illustration right here. Bookwalter owns vast tracts of wild land and wants $1 per acre, while I can get small tracts at thirty cents. Phillips Brothers hav in cultivation sixty farms; the appurtenances are meager, yet they insist upon the regular rent. I can assure the readers that unless we hav a change in the railroad and money policy of this country it will be but a few years before nine-tenths of our farms that are now mortgaged will be in the hands of the few shylocks, and such defenders of the corrupt system as Mr. Denslow will find degradation and ruin on every hand. I am glad you gave him space, as we like all sides.

I admire the management of the best of all papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER. Would it not be in order to send Comstock a skunk by express? I think that the company would be consoling.

We are in good fighting trim here if we can get some sky-pilot to open his battery outside of the pulpit. Our Union is proud of the work we hav done since we organized. May every town where there are six or more good Liberals form a Union, and they will find plenty to do. I admire the articles of E. A. Stevens. I think he is the right man in the right place. Watson Heston is also a trump card.

E. W. MINER, Sec. Axtell Liberal Union.

OPEN LETTER TO REV. DEWITT TALMAGE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., May 11, 1888.

REV. MR. TALMAGE, Dear Sir: I hav heard you preach, and hav read many of your discourses in the leading papers, and was at one time one of your ardent admirers, but either you or I hav changed, perhaps both. I now hav a Boston Globe before me with your sermon for May 6th, and am astonished at the lack of logic in your remarks.

You assume that there is such a thing as a soul, which is a very fundamental point. In fact, everything depends on whether man has an immortal soul to trade or to save. And if it is really immortal, his swapping or trading it is impossible; no amount of selling could ever make it mortal. Then, if man has no immortal soul and if death does end all—and you do not know but it does—are not the pleasures of this world worth having? Is it not the idea that eternal and unutterable bliss is awaiting you that makes many of earth's joys and pleasures so unsatisfactory to you, and if you thus blur and destroy all this world's pleasures, and there is no other, are you not a loser of everything? Is not a man a fool who will sell what he knows he has, even if he cannot be sure of it long, yet it being what he can now feel and see and enjoy, for something that a priest describes to him as attainable by him in the future if he will giv up all to the priest? One would think you very familiar with all the properties of souls. You seem to know as much about them as a pedlar does about his wares. You hav doubtless seen their wings; witnessed their velocity, weight, etc.; "seen them leap" across "chasms of immensity." When it meets your purpose, you speak of the soul as though it were the body, and then when it meets your purpose you speak of its being infinit, etc. Is it not sophistry to compare, as you continually do, dissimilar things in a careless way as though they were similar?

You also believe there are lovely flowers in heaven; they are "the spirits of dead flowers." If flowers hav immortal spirits, or souls, why not grass and trees and thorns and thistles, etc.? What becomes of the souls of all the potatoes you and other animals eat? But you say flowers hav odors, and these odors are souls. Exactly so; so do potatoes, tomatoes, and many mineral substances hav odors. Are they possessed of immortal souls? What about the animal kingdom—are there to be no birds, no pet lambs, no playful kittens, no loving, faithful dogs, and no noble horses in heaven? Surely muskrats and skunks will be there. They hav strong odors. But perhaps I am too hasty; perhaps the Lord has privately told you that all the disagreeable beasts will go down to that place paved with hot brimstone and frolic around for the entertainment of Ingersoll & Co. and all who in this world doubted that they had souls. What but a bloodthirsty, depraved set of lunatics would look at a "lamb slain, wounded in the head, wounded in the feet and in the side," and then start in singing a perpetual song of "Hosanna! Hosanna!" etc.? What a hard, cold place that celestial city must be—all gold, gold, and precious stones! Any feather-beds up there? Why don't you picture out a reasonable sort of a place, one that will look consistent with the nature of things, and then people will be more likely to think you know more about it than themselvs?

But where were all these immortal souls before they were born? This world is one vast cemetery; the very soil under our feet is composed almost wholly of the dead, decayed bodies of plants and animals. Where now are all of their souls? Are there any more souls in existence now than a thousand years ago? If so, is the universe going to be ultimately all made up into souls? If this world had a beginning; if this life had a beginning; if mind had a beginning; if reason, love, hope, fear, pleasure, pain, etc., had beginning, then we and all are sure to hav ends. If I am eternity bound, I am coëxistent with God and must always hav existed.

How large is a soul? What is its shape? Can a thousand of them dance on the point of a cambric needle, as one Christian says, or are they the full size of the bodies they inhabited? And if you say you do not know, you probably will tell the truth, but you will seem ridiculous to hav said so much about that of which you know absolutely nothing and which you cannot even prove that you or anyone else has had or ever will hav. Many men spend their time and lives trying to explain a thing or prove it only to find after all that it had no real existence except in the imagination. Natural facts are not hard to prove. If there were any such things as souls apart from bodies, it would be self-evident, and no one would dispute it. No one disputes the multiplication-table. Why soar into visionary nothings when there are poetry and pleasure enough in contemplating solid facts? Talk about what you know; don't try to entertain people and get their money for telling them what you don't know, is my advice to you and all preachers. The clear reason why the clergy cry down and try to depreciate the value of this world is that they want the people to contribute largely of their money and goods to the Lord and his servants, especially the servants. If this world is such a miserable concern, its happiness so ungratifying, etc., it reflects rather roughly on the skill of the one said to hav made it. And if it is such a worthless piece of property, it is strange that the Lord, living in such luxury as golden streets, etc., should need any part of it to complete his own happiness. While we born here don't need any of it—giv it all up for Christ and then giv ourselvs up, too; be his slave, and if we are not happy now we will be in that sweet by and by.

I want solid facts for humanity. C. L. HASKELL.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Redbird and the Oriole.

A TRUE INCIDENT.

I stood at my window a morning in May
While a redbird was singing just over the way,
And the merriest note was his "Chee, chee, chee!"
And he looked like a bright shuttle tossed on the sea:
Yet he treated with scorn my handful of crumbs,
And I tried him again with a knot of gray thrums
That I carelessly hung on the green, swaying bough,
While hither and thither he fluttered. And now
He has found it—but that moment there came
A fierce oriole with a jacket of flame
That swooped down upon it with beak and with claws,
And cared not a fig for the other, because
He knew it had all been ordered for him,
So he furiously tore down the whole from the limb,
Swinging straight to the ground in the greed of his gain,
Holding fast with his feet and his bill to the skein,
Till the long wisp had fallen from out of the tree.
Then the gay, flashy oriole, where, where was he?
All ignominious he lay on the ground,
Where not a bright feather of him could be found,
His back to the grass and his feet in the air.
Was ever a bird in such plight, I declare?
Covered o'er with the shreds of the gray—and with shame—
No morsel we saw of his waistcoat of flame,
But heard a glad trilling far up in the tree;
'Twas the redbird a-mocking and crying, "Chee, chee!"

Coral Formations.

The Mangrove islands, near the western coast of south Florida, are splendid illustrations of coral formations.

Once having seen them, the theory of their growth is apparent, because of the various types and stages of development.

Take, for instance, any one of these islands and it is at once observed that its origin was a simple polyp, adhering to a rock, to which the corllet—the calcareous secretion, or cell—becomes affixed.

This polyp multiplies, by producing eggs and budding coral grains, by additional cells being produced by the offspring, and thus the secretions of multitudes of these marine animals form into extensiv rocks.

Layers upon layers continue to form until the surface of the water is reached.

Many kinds of debris are lodged by the gulf waves upon this formation; vegetable matter decomposes; seeds, which hav been conveyed by various agencies, germinate and flourish.

The mangroves are the first to grow on these islands. The flow and ebb of the tide leaves the seeds lodged in crevices of the rocks, and they rapidly spring up, and ere many seasons they form such a network of roots that the current of water is turned. Among these roots floating debris is lodged, and upon that the waves wash shells, sand, and soil.

Upon this various forms of vegetation grow luxuriously, and finally the coral island becomes the home of many animals; among them being the cultivators of tropical fruits.

Frances Wright.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I saw in THE TRUTH SEEKER last December a biographical sketch, from your talented pen, of the most remarkable and talented woman that ever graced the lecture platform in the United States. She might well be called the female Ingersoll of America. I mean Frances Wright. I think she was different from Colonel Ingersoll in many respects. Ingersoll only attacks priestcraft; Frances Wright attacked priestcraft, kingcraft, statecraft, bankcraft, and even the lawcraft. She thought the lawcraft more dangerous than priestcraft, as the lawyers drafted all the laws; they drafted them to suit their interests—the more numerous the laws the more business for them. She opposed monopolies of every description. She was a friend of the producers of all wealth; and of free schools, as her lectures on "Knowledge" conclusivly prove. Those lectures on "Knowledge" were given at her expense in all the principal cities of the United States. They were designed to ameliorate the condition of the downtrodden toilers of the land. She taught and believed that there could be no such thing as equality until the masses were as well educated as the classes. I became acquainted with Frances Wright by her lectures on "Knowledge," as published in the Free Enquirer as early as October, 1828, Robert Dale Owen and Frances Wright editors. In the year 1838 I commenced business in Cincinnati. Frances Wright and Mr. D'Arismont were then living on the corner of William and Elm streets. I often heard her lecture; in that way I became personally acquainted with her and Mr. D'Arismont. In 1840 there was a literary society formed in Cincinnati called the Franklin Institute. Mr. D'Arismont and myself were members of the society; I soon became intimately acquainted with him. As I was a builder, carpenter, and joiner, I did considerable work for him. Mr. D'Arismont was a scientific man, enthusiastic for the education of the masses. He approved of the lectures on knowledge. They both believed in a practical education. That neither possessed, which they regretted exceedingly. I hav heard Frances Wright blame her uncle and aunt for not giving her a practical education instead of Greek and Latin. She never dressed herself till she became of age; a servant was at her heels by night and by day. She never made her bed, never swept her room, never cooked a meal or hemmed a handkerchief, or washed one either. I built two houses for her; in that way I was in her company a great deal and learned from her own lips more of her true history than will ever be known from any of her writings.

Your biographical sketch is in the main correct, with one or two exceptions. Her land you speak of was located back of Memphis ten miles. She lived in the family of Lafayette some time, and paid out of her own pocket the whole expense of the housekeeping. Lafayette, if you recollect, was confined in an Austrian or Prussian prison, his property confiscated, and was poor at the time Frances Wright was invited to his house. This I had from her own lips.

Another mistake that has crept into your biographical sketch is that Frances Wright and Mr. D'Arimont did not liv together happily; I think it a great mistake, and I know it is false. The reason why many people thought they did not liv happily together was that they did not understand the philosophy of marriage as they understood it. Mr. D'Arismont and Frances Wright both believed that the marriage contract ought not to interfere with the personal rights of the individual either in person or property. They did not believe in the Paul doctrin for the wife to submit to the wishes of her husband in all things just to please him and the Lord, or to replenish the earth with human beings, to obey another command. They believed it was a great sin to bring a child into existence when the prospects were that that child would be miserable by that existence, just to gratify one of the lowest instincts. Frances Wright believed that every woman ought to retain her own name, do business in her own name; that the wife's property should not revert to the husband when married. This also was the opinion of Mr. D'Arismont. She conducted her business in her own name, attended to it in person. Mr. D'Arismont had no more to do with her business than a stranger.

Those buildings I built for her; she was her own architect. She traveled a great deal. She went twice to Europe after I was acquainted with her. Mr. D'Arismont did not accompany her in any of her travels. He attended to the education of Silva, the only child by that union, according to agreement before marriage. He was to educate all the children and she was to determin the number she would consent to be mother of. They believed that marriage as at present practiced is vile prostitution.

You can guess now why all Christians and many Infidels hav thought they did not liv happily together. JOEL BROWN.

Correspondence.

SAN JACINTO, CAL., May 6, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to any paper, but I will do the best I can. Father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER several years. He is taking Freethought and the Ironclad Age now. Mr. Putnam and Mr. Reynolds hav both lectured here at our town. Will you please tell me what the Speak No Evil Society is? I think I would like to join it. I hav an essay entitled, "The May Picnic," that I will send you, and if you think it is good enough to print in the Children's Corner, I would like it very much. Our family are all Liberals, and we like all of the Liberal papers. I hope I will see my letter and essay printed. I send you a card for a keepsake. I must close. From a Liberal friend, MARTHA DEMING (aged fifteen).

[The Speak No Evil Society is as it indicates—its members learn to curb the tongue and to speak no evil of anyone.—ED. C. C.]

MONTE VISTA, COL., April 7, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav a little black dog and his name is Jip. He chases jack-rabbits through the sage-brush. I made a pincushion for my auntie. I am sorry that your dear mother is dead. I am almost five years old.

LAURA LAMSON.

[Little Laura is our youngest correspondent. We feel quite sure she is a dear little darling girl, and the editor of the Corner sends her a sweet kiss to-day.—ED. C. C.]

SAN DIEGO, CAL., May 7, 1888.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Sister: I thus address you because I believe all of "Adam's sons and daughters" should be indeed brothers and sisters in all pertaining to the uplifting of human kind.

My chief reason, however, for addressing you these lines lies in the fact that I am desirous of soliciting all the information obtainable from those of practical experience in the work of teaching our little ones, and youth of all ages, the principles and Liberalizing ideas of Freethought. I wish to know what methods are the most successful in not only training the young mind to think for itself, but also to maintain the interest in the children's lyceum with undiminishing ardor, to the end that both old and young will not tire or grow weary in the good cause.

Is it possible to attain such excellent results, or am I soaring beyond possibility?

Is there at present being published any Liberal paper devoted exclusivly to the young?

What books for the little readers are there to be had, and on what terms can the foregoing be secured?

By these queries you understand that we wish to organize a society especially devoted to inculcation of humanitarian and progressiv ideas in the minds of the children of Liberalism, and therefore wish you to aid us so far as within your power with whatever of thought, wisdom, or experience you hav to offer.

It appears to me to be a work much needed, and yet one that is much neglected. If we expect our cause to keep pace with the advance of the age, we who cry so loudly for free thought, free speech, and free press must needs bestir ourselvs to more diligent effort.

Hoping I hav not transgressed too much upon your time, I close by asking for the addresses of all those who you think might be able to contribute some suggestion or aid us in our undertaking. With earnest endeavors for progress, I remain,

Sincerely, J. EMMETT SMITH.

[An excellent way to develop thought is to suggest topics to the child. For instance, tell him to take note of the trees as he passes, their names, shape, form of limbs, leaves, trunk, fruit, etc.; learn the hight, age, and all pertaining to their growth. Or ask him about the kinds of flowers, fruit, vegetables, or animals he sees in walking—about all their ways and habits. Let him discover all he can and tell it. Encourage him to ask questions.

Vary the program in the lyceum by recitations, songs, and dialogs, and an occasional picnic or tea party; form a debating class among the children, hav classes in natural history, in poetry, drawing, etc.

There is no paper now published of the stamp mentioned. There doubtless will be when Liberals are ready to maintain one.

The Truth Seeker Company furnish catalogs of the few really Liberal books for children.—ED. C. C.]

J. W. has our thanks for samples of Sambuci (San Souci) and Lachryma Christa. The first is well calculated to drive dull care away, and the latter, from its name, ought to remove all traces of sin from anyone fortunate enough to behold its liquid clearness.

"The good doctor" will please, also, accept thanks for handsome beaded moccasins, pincushion, and other useful articles. The editor of the Corner thinks herself fortunate in the possession of so many kind, loving, and appreciativ friends, and while she livs will endeavor to preserve their esteem and friendship.

When Mr. Hiram Wentworth learns to write a good, sensible letter, and stops calling our dear little children "silly" and "stupid," his light may then shine in the Children's Corner. He is too big a boy to write nonsense.—ED. C. C.

The Reason Benny Should Know.

In a Sunday-school not a thousand miles from Jesup there was a young lady teacher who had a class of boys ranging in years from three to fourteen. When the class commenced to recite the teacher asked a great big, gawky boy who made him.

"I dunno," replied the boy.

"What, a boy of fourteen years old and doesn't know who made him? Why, there's little Benny Jones, only three years old, and I'll bet he can tell who made him. Come up here, Benny. Benny, who made you?"

"Dod," said the bright little three-year-old.

"Do you hear that?" said the teacher.

"Well," said gawky, sniffling, "I reckon he can tell who made him, 'cause 'taint been long since he was made."

The Faithful Dog Again.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Daily Telegraph heard the following from a friend in Budapest: A few days ago the new bishop of Waitzen, in Hungary, was sitting at dinner in his own house with seven friends, when all at once a small dog belonging to him ran up, and seizing the tail of his coat, tried to pull him toward his bedroom door, which opened into the dining-room. At first he drove the animal away, but it whined piteously, and his guests advised him to see what it wanted. The bedroom door was thrown open, and by the light from the dining-room the bishop and his friends discovered a man hidden under the bed armed with a large knife. He was dragged out, and made to confess that he had escaped from the town jail, and was bent on robbery.

A RICHLY dressed lady stopped a boy trudging along with a basket, and asked, "My little boy, hav you got religion?" "No, ma'am," said the innocent, "I've got potatoes."

"MOTHER, hav I got any children?" asked little Johnny Fizzletop. "Who? No, child; what put that in your head?" "I read in the Bible about children's children. That's what put it in my head."

THE Boston idea.—"Mamma," inquired little Waldo Bunker, of Boston, who is spending the winter in Florida, "what is that body of water?" "The Atlantic ocean, my dear." "The Atlantic ocean!" exclaimed little Waldo, in amazement, "why, I thought the Atlantic ocean was near Boston!"

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher, after relating to the children the story of Ananias and Sapphira, asked them, "Why does not God strike everybody dead who tells a lie?" One of them immediately answered, "Because then there wouldn't be anybody left!" That child evidently hasn't a very high opinion of the veracity of his Christian instructors and associates.—Freethinker.

Poetry.

My Bed of Death.

I ask not that my bed of death
From bands of greedy heirs be free;
For these besiege the latest breath
Of fortune's favored sons, not me.

I ask not each kind soul to keep
Tearless, when of my death he hears;
Let those who will, if any, weep!
There are worse plagues on earth than tears.

I ask but that my death may find
The freedom to my life denied;
Ask but the folly of mankind
Then, then at last, to quit my side.

Spare me the whispering, crowded room,
The friends who come, and gape, and go;
The ceremonious air of gloom—
All, which makes death a hideous show!

Nor bring, to see me cease to liv,
Some doctor full of phrase and fame,
To shake his sapient head, and giv
The ill he cannot cure a name.

Nor fetch, to take the accustomed toll
Of the poor sinner bound for death,
His brother-doctor of the soul,
To canvass with official breath

The future and its viewless things—
That undiscovered mystery
Which one who feels Death's winnowing wings
Must needs read clearer, sure, than he!

Bring none of these; but let me be,
While all around in silence lies,
Moved to the window near, and see,
Once more, before my dying eyes,

Bathed in the sacred dews of morn,
The wide aerial landscape spread—
The world which was ere I was born,
The world which lasts when I am dead;

Which never was the friend of one,
Nor promised love it could not giv,
But lit for all its generous sun,
And lived itself, and made us liv.

There let me gaze, till I become
In soul, with what I gaze on, wed!
To feel the universe my home,
To hav before my mind—instead

Of the sick room, the mortal strife,
The turmoil for a little breath—
The pure, eternal course of life,
Not human combatings with death.

—Matthew Arnold.

That Badger Boy At Sunday-School.

SECOND LESSON OF MOSES.

The teacher read farther along in the book of Exodus, and finishing, that Badger boy cast his grappling-irons, so to speak, and boarded ship for loot in the shape of information.

"Them was high kickers that Mose led, warn't they, mum? If they warn't kickin' at the Lord, they was kickin' at Mose, but allus a kickin'! They was a tuff lot, warn't they, mum?"

"They were very rebellious at times, James."

"Yes'm. I s'pose there was a spring where Mose hit the rock with his club, don't you, mum?"

"I suppose—no, I don't suppose—I know, you heathen boy, that Moses smote the rock and water came that never flowed before."

"Yes'm. How do you know, mum?"

"Because it is so written in God's book, you young Infidel!"

"Yes'm. How nice your obbun hare looks this mornin', mum!"

"Do you think so, James? Well, I'm glad it pleases you, dear. If you would only be as Christian in your talk as I think you are at heart, you don't know how pleased I should be, dear."

"Yes'm. What did Mose hav to do with the fust lot of commandments, mum?"

"Nothing, dear; they were written by the finger of God on the tables."

"Yes'm. What'd he want Mose on the hill with him for forty days and forty nites, then, mum?"

"I don't know, James, and you must not ask such questions. It is awful wicked."

"No'm. But God made Mose rite the second batch 'cos he smashed the fust ones, didn't he, mum?"

"Perhaps, James. Only he and Moses knew why."

"Yes'm. Coodn't God made 'em up sooner'n forty days and nites, mum? I guess he woodn't do for a newspaper man if he coodn't——"

"You James Badger—you awful boy—you stop!"

"Yes'm. I'll bet pop cood a rit 'em in ten min——"

"O you horrible boy! go home!"

"No'm—please. I'll be good, and ma said you was a most lovely Sunday-school teacher, when you went by this mornin', mum." [The writer thinks the little cuss was lying here—under a mistake, at least. However, he caught on, as it were.]

"Dear me, James, I hadn't ought to forget myself so, and get so provoked with you, but I am only mortal, you know. Your mother was very kind, dear, to speak so of me."

"Yes'm. Mose was orfle mad when he come down the hill and seen that gold carf sot up for God, warn't he, mum?"

"Yes, dear, and righteously so—it was awful, wasn't it?"

"Yes'm. It was kinder ruff for Moses to hav three thousand folks killed, warn't it, mum?"

"No, James, it was a righteous judgment. They were idolators, and deserved to die."

"Yes'm. What's idolators, mum—them as goes for the dollars?"

"Well, you hav just about hit it, James, for they are worshipers of the golden calf the same as those Hebrews that were slain."

"Yes'm. S'pose Mose liked it up there on the hill with God, forty days and forty nites, and then another dose of it, mum?"

"Why, of course, James. Why, he was glorified, you see! Wouldn't you hav liked it, dear?"

"No'm. You bet I woodn't! I don't like fire and smoke in mine, and sech an orfle head as God had onto him!"

"James—James!"

"Yes'm. Was they wurshupin' that gold carf, mum, when Mose come down?"

"Yes, dear—just think of it! Wasn't it awful?"

"Yes'm. 'F I'd a been Aaron I'd a made a gold bull. That wood been a bully god, woodn't it, mum? Knocked a carf higher'n a kite!"

"O James! you are too awful for anything!"

"No'm. Was them real fire snakes that made it so interestin' for the Sheneys, mum? Did they hav red-hot teeth, like rattlers duz, mum?"

"They were real snakes of fire, James, sent by the Lord to punish the Hebrews for their wickedness!"

"Yes'm. Ma was readin' about 'em the uther nite to company—she alluz duz somethin' to make it pleasant for company, you know—and pop got his oar in and said, 'Oh, them ducks had been on a tare and had the jimjams! That's what the matter was with the duffers when they saw the snakes!'"

"Oh, mercy me! your pa is awful, James!"

"No'm. Wood lookin' at a brass snake on a pole cure a rattler bite, mum?"

"Yes, you boy, if God so ordered it!"

"Huh! pop'll bet yer twenty dollars 'genst them store teeth of yourn——"

"Oh! oh! you horrible James Badger—oh, you awful little monster, you get out just as quick as the Lord will let you—go! The class is dismissed." And thus ended the second and last séance of Moses. SI SLOKUM.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

THE NINE DEMANDS

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

MOSES GETS MAD.

And it came to pass, as soon as he came nigh unto the camp, that he saw the calf, and the dancing: and Moses's anger waxed hot, and he cast the tables out of his hands, and brake them beneath the mount.—Ex. xxxii, 19.

Odds and Ends.

ONE of the main questions of the age in regard to some men is not, What do they liv on? but, Why do they liv on?

MOTHER: "And the serpent, as a punishment for tempting Eve, was made to crawl all the rest of his life." Bobbie: "Well, mamma, how did he get along before?"

IN the court room: "Why is it they are so mighty particular about keeping order here?" "The judge, you remember, can only serve during good behavior."

BROWN (of Chicago): "That fellow is looking at you rather hard. Do you know him?" Mrs. Brown: "His face does look familiar. What's his name?" Brown: "Goldplate, I believe." Mrs. Brown: "Oh, yes! I remember him now. He was my first husband."

"LOVERS are prone to self-depreciation," said he, tenderly, as they sat looking at the stars; "I do not understand what you see in me that you love me." "That's what everybody says," gurgled the ingenuous maiden. Then the silence became so deep that you could hear the stars twinkling.

MISSISSIPPI editors are overworked. The other day a molder of public opinion in that state wrote a column editorial in support of the Mills free trade bill, drank a pint of whisky, and killed the editor of a "vile and slimy contemporary" before noon, and he didn't begin work until 8:30 A.M, "nuther."

"MY friend," he said to a young man who bore signs of dissipation, "do you realize that the road you are following leads eventually to death?" "Er—well, yes, sir." "Aye, it leads eventually to death! And do you know where the road of sobriety and virtue leads to?" "Yes, sir; that leads eventually to death, also."

CLERGYMAN (calling at No. —ty Fifth avenue, to little boy): "What are the Ten Commandments, my little man?" Little boy (who has been taught etiquet by his mamma): "Thou shalt not eat with a knife; thou shalt not ask for soup twice; thou shalt not drink out of the sugar-bowl; thou shalt not——" Clergyman: "That will do, my son."

"I HAV nothing to say, your honor," responded the prisoner, who had been convicted of bigamy; "I can only ask the mercy of the court." "Since you ask the mercy of the court," said his honor, "and there are four women who will probably claim you for a husband when you are free once more, I will giv you ten years in state prison, instead of five."

HAD I the right—
I wish I might—
Think you those lips I'd kiss?
Do you believe—
Can you conceive—
That such a chance I'd miss?

Could I but see
That I were he
Who might her rage defy,
Do you suppose
That I would lose
The time 'twould take to try?

MISS VASSAR (just graduated with high honors): "I declare it's too provoking. Here we've been out three days, and watched and watched, and havn't seen one yet." The doctor (gallantly): "It is too bad. Now just tell me what you are looking for, Miss Vassar." "Why, the lines of latitude and longitude, to be sure. I hav always wondered how the ships got over them—or is it under them?—it is very puzzling."

"PAPA," said a beautiful girl, as the old gentleman came in very late, "did you notice the dead body of a young man in the yard?" "Why, no: what's the matter?" "I refused young Mr. Paperwate to-night, and from the hopeless, despairing look upon his face when he staggered from the house, I fear he may hav killed himself" "Well, I'm glad you refused him," said the old man spitefully; "he has just beaten me five straight games of billiards."

"WELL, deacon," said the new minister of a Dakota church, "did my initial sermon seem to please the congregation?" "Yes; some of the boys were havin' a little game of draw after the meetin' was over, an' the general sentiment among 'em was 'bout unanimous in your favor. Homestretch Mike allowed the sermon wasn't much, but he hed jest run up agin' fours with a king full, an' under them circumstances a'most anythin' would natterly seem kind o' ornery."

SHE was the reigning belle!
Straightway in love I fell;
Potent became the spell—
Too plain for masking.
Then for a time I wooed—
For her sweet favor sued,
Till I'd my courage screwed
Up to the "asking."

Out of the glare and heat,
Where to the music's beat
Tripped the untiring feet
Of the gay dancer,
Gently I led my fair
Partner, so debonair,
Told her the whole, and there
Waited her answer.

Sweet was the flowers' perfume—
Weird the enshadowing gloom;
From the gay, lighted room,
Sweet strains came faintly.
Turning, she smiled and blushed,
Murmured surprise, and flushed,
Then, in the silence hushed,
Answered me quaintly.

Doubtless you think she said,
When she had raised her head,
That which all lovers dread:
"She'd be my sister!"
That's where you've made a guess
Wrong, as you must confess;
For she said softly: "Yes!"
Yes! and I kissed her!

Gems of Thought.

THE origin of all religions, creeds, and sacred books is substantially the same, and the history of one is, in the main, the history of all. Thus far these religions hav been the mistaken explanations of our surroundings. The appearances of nature hav imposed on the ignorance and fear of man. But back of all honest creed was, and is, the desire to know, to understand, and to explain; and that desire will, as I most fervently hope and earnestly believe, be gratified at last by the discovery of the truth. Until then, let us bear with the theories, hopes, dreams, and mistakes, and honest thoughts of all men.—Ingersoll.

THE finest fruits, the choicest grains, the most beautiful flowers, do not grow spontaneously on every hand, but hav to be cultivated with care. The weeds, the thistles, the nettles, and the poisonous plants hav to be uprooted and removed. So it is with personal qualities and individual characteristics. Some are less useful and less to be admired than others. One class needs culture and care, and the other should be destroyed. Let us apply the same tactics and practices in one field that we do in another, and we can succeed in making this world about as pleasant and happy as we wish. We will not need to wait till we die before we go to heaven, for we can get up one here on our own account, and if there is a continued existence after this life, we will be far better prepared for it than by neglecting our own faults and depending upon the virtues of another.—D. M. Bennett.

IN the name of the gods, what is more desirable, what is more excellent, than wisdom? What is better for man? What more worthy of man? They, therefore, who court her are termed philosophers, for philosophy, if the word is to be interpreted, implies nothing but the love of wisdom.—Cicero.

HAPPY is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding. For the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. She is more precious than rubies, and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her.—Proverbs iii, 13-15.

NOT to know at large of things remote
From use, obscure, and subtle, but to know
That which before us lies in daily life,
Is the prime wisdom. What is more, is fume,
Or emptiness, or fond impertinence. —Milton.

THERE is not throughout the whole book called the Bible any word that describes to us what we call a "poet," nor any word that describes poetry. The cause is, that the word "prophet," to which latter times hav affixed a new idea, was the Bible word for poet, and the word "prophesying" meant the art of making poetry. It also meant the art of playing poetry to a tune upon any instrument of music —Thomas Paine.

POET and prophet differ greatly in our loose modern notions of them. In some old languages again, the titles are synonymous. Vates means both prophet and poet; and, indeed, at all times prophet and poet, well understood, hav much kindred of meaning. Fundamentally, indeed, they are the same; in this most important respect especially, that they hav penetrated both of them into the sacred mystery of the universe; what Goethe calls "the open secret."—Thomas Carlyle

NOR sometimes forget
Those other two, equaled with me in fate,
So were I equaled with them in renown,
Blind Thamyris and blind Maconides,
And Tiresias and Phinaus, prophets old.
Then feed on thoughts, that voluntary move
Harmonious numbers; as the wakeful bird
Sings darkling, and in shadiest covert bid
Tunes her nocturnal note. —Milton.

IF this be rather the truth, that the death of the soul and of the body is one and the same, and that no consciousness remains; as there is no advantage in death, so certainly there is no evil. For when consciousness is lost, it becomes the same as if we had never been born at all.—Cicero.

NEXT to eternal life is eternal death. Upon the shadowy shore of death the sea of trouble casts no wave. Eyes that hav been curtained by the everlasting dark will never know again the touch of tears. Lips that hav been touched by eternal silence will never utter another word of grief. Hearts of dust do not break. The dead do not weep; and I would rather think of those I hav loved, and those I hav lost, as having returned, as having become a part of the elemental wealth of the world—I would rather think of them as unconscious dust, I would rather think of them as gurgling in the stream, floating in the clouds, bursting in the foam of light upon the shores of worlds—I would rather think of them as the inanimate and eternally unconscious, than to hav even a suspicion that their naked souls had been clutched by an orthodox God.—Ingersoll.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Washington Critic says that Mr. Cleveland may be a Mugwumpic Democrat, but he isn't a Mugwumpic Presbyterian.

THE World states: "Col. Robert G. Ingersoll denies the report that he is to present Judge Gresham's name to the Chicago convention. Ingersoll is not a delegate to the convention, and he says that he has no present intention of making a speech of any kind at the Chicago gathering."

IN a letter to the Sun, Belva Lockwood, the Equal Rights candidate for president of the United States, writes: "Should you still hav any doubts about man being a comprehensiv term, embracing woman, turn to the Revised Statutes." The Sun ought to be ashamed of itself for raising this question, says the Scranton Truth. Of course man embraces woman.

GOVERNOR HILL having signed the bill to that effect, after the 1st of next January electricity will be substituted for hanging as the method of administering the death penalty in the state of New York. This change, says the evening Sun, is in accordance with the increasing tenderness of modern civilization with regard to the infliction of pain upon man or beast, for by means of the electric current death can be produced instantaneously, and without the shock to the sensibilities of the observers caused by other forms of legal execution, whether by harging, by the ax, or even by the garote. The criminal is dispatched neatly, expeditiously, and painlessly, and that the method of death is sure has been proved in the many cases of men who hav dropped dead instantly after touching electric light wires. The condemned will be seated blindfolded on a chair provided with the proper electrical appliances and attachments, and on the touching of a button by the executioner he will be dead.

THE Boston Watchman winds up the funeral notice of a sister who died recently in Essex Center, Vt., with this lofty compliment: "She was a member of the Baptist church, and for many years a subscriber to the Watchman, which she highly prized." The editor of the Watchman does not mention any other of his deceased subscriber's virtues, says Life, evidently being of opinion that anyone who highly prized his paper is sufficiently authenticated for this world and the world to come.

AT a meeting of the Anti-Poverty Society two weeks ago, Dr. McGlynn declared that there was nothing in the nature of an antagonism between religion and the doctrin of the Anti-Poverty Society, but there was a great and a vital struggle between the church machine and the Society. The Society was struggling for the rights of humanity, as true religion always was. The machine was busy looking after the temporal welfare of the "machinists," in keeping the temporal power of the pope properly bolstered up, and in securing fat offices for relativs and favorits. Christ had this same struggle with the church machine. "The high priests and their ilk had him denounced as a Socialist because he talked doctrins just as we are doing to-day. He wanted to save souls. His antagonists were more concerned about their miserable bodies. Why, if Christ should come on earth to-day—this very night—he would find a more hearty welcome on the stage of this hall than he would in many of the musty, moth-eaten pulpits of the city."

THE International Congress of Anthropology, the first ever held in this country, held its first session June 4th in one of the halls of Columbia College, under the direction of the New York Academy of Anthropology, and presided over by Dr. E. C. Mann, M.D., F.S.S., president of that body. Dr. Mann delivered the opening address, which was an admirable and exhaustiv review of the world's progress in the science of anthropology. Respecting the antiquity of man, the speaker said, light has been constantly shed by new discoveries and investigations. The combined labor of Messrs. Whitney, Dawkins, Tiddeman, Croll, Skertchley, and Geikie hav added to the conviction that man existed during the Post Glacial period; that that Glacial period was not an uninterrupted one of cold, there being at least four ice ages with intervening cold and warm periods, and during these periods, as indicated by the remains found, man was an inhabitant of our planet, with animals either now extinct or only found in warm latitudes; while Professor Hughes, on the contrary, maintains that the evidence relied on to show the existence of man during the Glacial period is far from satisfactory. Wallace says to-day not only is the belief in man's vast and still unknown antiquity universal among men of science, but it is hardly disputed by any well-informed theologian. The views of astronomers, geologists, and physical geographers upon the age of the earth show a wide diversity between them so irreconcilable as to show that our knowledge is not sufficiently advanced to admit of any reliable theory as to the age of the earth.

AMONG its interesting gossip of the day the Sun records that "since Mr. Hugh O. Pentecost—for he announced on Sunday that he objects to being called reverend—resigned his Newark pastorate, he has become a sort of free lance, and rides full tilt against existing conditions—social, political, and religious. Possessed of au attractiv presence, a clear, pleasant-toned voice, perfect enunciation, easy manner, and a good power of sarcasm, Mr. Pentecost naturally draws a good-sized audience at the Masonic Temple, where he speaks Sunday mornings. He has become a confirmed advocate of Henry George's land theory. In a recent sermon he preached on the question, 'Is the Soul Immortal?' and showed that, as far as that matter is concerned, he is an Agnostic. Last Sunday he took for his subject, 'Something Better than Orthodoxy.' He did not dwell extensivly on the preferable substitute, but was sufficiently vehement in his arraignment of orthodoxy to suit the most ardent Infidel. He denounced the church of to-day as an organization of modern Pharisees, and spoke bitterly of his former brethren as a class, the clergymen. 'I believe,' he said, 'that one of Talmage's sermons against Infidelity does more to disgust sensible people with the Christian religion than all of Robert G. Ingersoll's speeches and writings put together.'" Regarding this last statement Mr. Pentecost is right. Colonel Ingersoll's lectures do not "disgust" sensible people with religion, but rather fill them with sorrow for the slavish intellectual habits of man, and indignation at the tyranny of priests and kings.

The Mission of Liberalism.

It is generally expected when a writer discusses a subject that he will define the terms of the proposition, or subject of his discourse, in order to giv the reader a clear understanding of the theme, and prevent the writer from wandering off into unnecessary and unimportant digressions.

Sometimes the terms are explicit enough to be well understood, and therefore save the writer the trouble of defining. Definition is also studiously avoided at times, which givs the writer an avenue of escape should his critics charge him with ignorance or prejudice.

The term Liberalism may be thought to be sufficiently well understood to need no defining; but the question having been lately asked if there was any such thing as Liberalism, the various answers the question has received might make one hesitate, if he takes a second thought, to define the term, as the meaning of the word seems to be as flexible and elastic as the cosmogony of Genesis in the hands of biblical exegetists.

Liberalism, in its broadest sense, means a complete toleration of ideas—universal liberty of thought, and complete liberty of action, so long as our acts are in harmony with our being and do not interfere in the rights of others. It is hardly possible for one to subscribe to any particular creed, either religious or political, and be thoroughly Liberal. Though it is not unfrequently the case that persons belonging to the most orthodox churches are decidedly Liberal, while it must be admitted that there are those who profess to hav become completely emancipated from superstition, and hav assumed the title of Liberal, who are most intolerant bigots. Liberalism with some too frequently means license; with others it means only liberty of conscience to themselvs and others who believe just right.

I do not wish to be freed from the broadest definition of Liberalism, but intend to keep that constantly in view, though I beg leave, for the present purpose, to confine myself to a more restricted sense, and shall limit the term to that phase of Liberalism which is activly opposed to superstition and error, and is honestly endeavoring to correct abuses arising through intrigues of kingcraft and priestcraft and a union of church and state.

Liberalism has a twofold mission: To eradicate error, destroying those baneful prejudices and superstitions which are the source of sectarian strife, national animosities, race prejudices, and which therefore augment the sum of human misery; its mission is also to preserve that which is good, to inculcate true principles of morality, and through universal mental liberty to unify the human race. Liberalism therefore has, like all progressiv movements, a destructiv and a constructiv side.

The work of destruction must necessarily precede the work of construction. Nothing can be done in constructiv work as long as our progress is impeded by the accumulated rubbish of centuries. If we wish to build a new edifice where an old one has stood for hundreds of years, do we not first hav to remove the old one? The decayed and ruined material must be removed; the tangled thickets of brier and vine must be cleared away; the ground must be prepared once more. So, in the case of intellectual progress, old errors, prejudices, and superstitions, the fearful nightmare of theology, must be overcome before constructiv work can with safety be commenced. Those doctrins which subjugate the spirit of man, those dogmas which hinder a free inquiry, must be obliterated.

For how is it possible that the horizon of the mind can expand when it is hedged in by a creed which teaches that the doctrins of any particular church or the statements of any particular book are infallible? If one is satisfied that he is right, that his religion is of divine revelation, and therefore nothing further can be learned regarding the doctrins of which it is the province of that religion to teach, there cannot possibly be any intellectual progress until doubts can be aroused. Skepticism is therefore the necessary antecedent of all progress.

Not only do those superstitious dogmas, by producing a stagnant mind through ignorance and fear, prevent the devotee from exercising freedom of thought, but the history of the church proves that those professing such creeds hav, in the most cruel and ignorant ways, endeavored to prevent others more bold than themselvs from exercising that inherent right of free thought and free speech. For those Liberals, then, who are working for the cause of humanity, who really hav the welfare of their fellowmen at heart, it becomes their duty to do what they can to free mankind from the thralldom of superstition. For one to read himself full, hav opportunity for reflection, and from the result of his study feel himself more of a man, a better citizen, a kinder father and husband, and then shut his information within his own mind, is to disregard the happiness of his fellow-creatures. The metaphor of hiding one's light under a bushel is just as true and just as fitting now as it was eighteen centuries ago. This, then, is not a question of policy, but one of imperativ duty. The fortresses of superstition and ignorance must be assailed by every method that is honorable. Any method that will stir the stagnant brain to thinking is justifiable—the force of logic and fact, the arrows of wit and humor, or the shafts of sarcasm and irony.

No doubt many pleasant memories cluster about those early teachings and associations. The scenes of childhood, the day-dreams of youth, are dearest to the human heart. It may seem harsh, even cruel, to turn the attention of mankind to the absurdities and falsities of those doctrins around which are entwined so many pleasant ties and sacred recollections. But we must remember that there is nothing sacred, nothing holy, but truth. Error, however masked, can be none other than baneful in its effects. The dogmas of Christianity hav tended more to separate than unite mankind. In the track of the church there hav followed discord, strife, jealousy, blood shed. The church has taught man's duty to man on wrong principles, and filled the dreams of the future with indescribable horrors. The moss-covered and ivy-grown cathedrals of superstition, dedicated to the service of an unknown God, in which dwell the bats and owls of the night, incapable of bearing the light of the approaching day, must be cleared away, and in their stead be erected temples of science, truth, and love, dedicated to the service of humanity.

But what are we going to giv in place of their religion? This is a question always asked by the Christian, and is generally considered by Liberals as having much weight. It is not to be supposed that there are no good precepts in the old religions worth preserving. "Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you," will always be a rule of action which commends itself to all honest men. But this precept has been the common property of mankind for thousands of years. Moral men lived and gave moral maxims for the guidance of humanity centuries before Christ was born. Christianity has added nothing to the stock of moral knowledge; she has simply reiterated maxims that hav been known to man ever since he has been advanced enough to hav a brain that can think and a heart that can feel. Whatever there is good, no matter where it came from, is not to be thrown away, nor can the element of goodness be eliminated from the human heart. It is simply the false and pernicious dogmas of religion that must be discarded. To think of supplying their place with other dogmas would be the hight of absurdity.

Supposing their God is a myth, shall we invent another one to take its place? If the various stories about crucified saviors are all false, shall we tell other lies to supply the void left in some minds because they hav found out the nature of the tales? If the existence of a hell and the doctrin of endless punishment are horrid absurdities, what sane person could ask for anything in their stead? What intelligent person is there to-day but is willing to let the doctrin of infant damnation go without asking for anything in its place? Would it not be considered idiotic in anyone to ask what affirmativ dogma we will giv in place of that outrageous old doctrin that "hell is crammed with infants damned?" Is it not enough for us to know that all those dogmas are false? Superstition is the result of a disordered condition of the mind produced by ignorant fear and the phantom of hope. If one is sick with a fever, will he ask the physician what he will giv in place of the disease? The fever is driven from his body that he may be free to use his entire physical power. So we wish to drive fear and superstition from the human mind so that we may investigate, exercise our brains with perfect freedom, and be willing to receive truth from every source.

Christianity has taught that man existed simply for the glory of God, and therefore his first duty was to worship his creator with fear and trembling; that good works were nothing only as they would redound to the glory of Jesus Christ.

Christianity has taught, Whatsoever thou asketh for, that shalt thou receive; men hav therefore wasted their energies in behalf of themselvs and fellow-beings in an ignorant appeal to the clouds.

Christianity has been the means of directing man to place all his affections on an imaginary being in the sky, and consequently he has had little room for sympathy in his heart for the struggling, suffering ones of earth.

Christianity teaches man to use his best energies to please an infinit being, to conciliate a God who is "angry with the wicked every day." As though we could possibly add to or detract from the pleasures or griefs of omnipotence! A finite being cannot commit a crime against a being who is infinit—one who is perfectly conditionless. What can we know of the thoughts or desires of a being who is infinit in power, boundless in love, limitless in thought? Granting that there is such a God, who holds us in the "hollow of his hand" and is the dispenser of life and all its joys and woes, would not such a being be capable of managing his own affairs without millions of voices petitioning him daily for some kind favor? Must we be constantly nudging him to remind him of his duty?

Most persons seem to think the only way they can please their God, the only way to make themselvs acceptable in the "sight of high heaven," is by indulging in a great amount of superstitious nonsense and religious folly.

But we can affect our fellow-man; we can contribute to his happiness, or add to his sorrows; we can feed him when he is hungry; clothe him when naked; alleviate his sufferings in sickness; educate him when ignorant. How much more necessary it is, then, to fit ourselvs to liv harmoniously in this world than to prepare for another! How much better to direct our attention to bettering the condition of mankind than to endeavor to please a God whom we can in no way influence!

Liberalism does not teach us to do right, to love mercy, and endeavor to make our fellow-beings happy, for Christ's sake, or for the hope of reward; but to do right for the sake of right, love mercy and deal justly with our fellow-men because in that way we contribute to the happiness and welfare of the world.

No one can do another a kindly act without being made better and happier by the joy he givs that other. No person can be perfectly happy while he knows there is a sentient being suffering from pain or sickness or for the necessaries of life. There are none of us but hav hours of unhappiness—made miserable through the misfortunes, ignorance, vices, and crimes of mankind. Then we should do what we can to better the condition of the world, not because we wish to please God or hope for a reward in the future, but because it makes our fellow-creatures and ourselvs happy—the goal of all existence. No one can see another wronged, robbed, or maltreated in any way without his sense of justice rising in indignation against the perpetrators of the wrong, and his sympathy being aroused in behalf of the wronged. We do not like to be stolen from, so we say, Steal not; we do not like to be defrauded, so we say, Defraud not; life is sweet, we object to being murdered, so we say, Kill not. The whole substance of the moral code is included in these beautiful words: "Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you."

Pittsville, Wis. GEO. H. DAWES.

(TO BE CONCLUDED)

Free Trade Caused the Revolution.

At this time, when the greatest question in American politics is being agitated in Congress, and engages the attention of men of all parties—I mean the tariff vs. free trade—I consider it a moral duty to call the attention of truth seekers to this subject, because I feel that it is the one thing that will make or unmake the prosperity of this land, as it always has heretofore.

I am aware that for years there has been a sentiment growing that tends toward a recognition of human rights in every land; and writers on political economy hav favored it in all their writings, regardless of the consequences to this country and its general prosperity; but while I am not opposed to bettering the condition of all nations, and aiding them by our example as a nation, I am of opinion that we cannot afford to do it by a ruination of our industries, which must in a short time reduce us to a dead level with the pauper state of many European countries. It is too serious a question to be made a mere party cry; and I hav only to show it in its true light to convince any unprejudiced reader of the fact that it was the principal grievance which led to the Revolution of the original Colonies, and the setting up of the great American nation.

Any person who will look into it will see that the free trade party in Congress is trying to do for Great Britain now just what the American Colonies resolved not to do in order to be free and independent states. They will see that in order to set themselvs free from the impositions of English manufacturers, and the odious duties and taxes imposed by that government on the Colonies, they were obliged to move with one mind, to establish manufactures here, and by a solemn combination refused to purchase anything abroad which they could make here or do without; and they were not successful or ready for separation until all the Colonies agreed to this patriotic principle, and they never could hav become a nation to this day had they not become unanimous on that vital question of American manufactures.

I am in possession of a very old book. Its pages are yellow with the decay of time. It was printed long before I was born, and I value it highly as a gift from a friend. It is called, "The Principles and Acts of the Revolution." I wish every free trader could read it and compare his unpatriotic votes for foreign labor with the votes of Patrick Henry, John Adams, and the founders of our republic, and read their speeches, too. It would convince him that nothing like the sentiment of free trade was cherished then, and not till long after did the cotton-growing gentry labor to fasten that curse upon us; but even then Old Hickory would not stand it, and threatened to "hang Calhoun as high as Hamaan" if he raised a hand against the government; and I learn also that Thomas Jefferson laid an embargo on English imports. There was no free trade Democracy then.

I find that from 1760 to 1780 these conventions were called in the Colonies, for the purpose of cementing this great principle and making it a united measure to be acted upon and strictly adhered to, that no goods should be imported from England, and it was finally the immediate cause of the revolt.

On page 167 may be found a sample of a call for a convention for the Colony of what is now the state of Maryland, at Annapolis, June 29, 1769: "Several counties having formed and entered into a compact by resolutions and solemn pledges on the non-importation of British goods and superfluities, and the province in general being invited by the people of Anne Arundel county to request the same gentlemen from each county to meet at this place on the 29th instant, in order that a general resolution of non-importation might be formed, which it is expected will be done with great unanimity throughout this province," etc. At this convention, which is but a sample of thousands that were called all over the Colonies, it was solemnly resolved and pledged that no colony should be admitted into the compact to be formed but such as should also enter into this question of non-importation of British goods, in which every sort and variety of goods were to be excluded, while home manufactures were to be encouraged by all. This method was started and gradually enlarged, and was persisted in until the end of the war. June 4, 1774, another monster convention was called, when the sentiment had become general. By the proceedings I find that British merchants were importing goods as agents for their lords and masters, just as now, watching our markets and flooding or holding goods to suit themselvs as to prices; and that it was stated at this convention that a profit of from 120 to 150 per cent on goods was the usual custom. Think of it, Americans—the founders of this government were compelled, under British rule, to pay 150 per cent profits on manufactured goods, when they had the power to enforce the laws, and in addition an income tax besides, levied on all manufactures. Is it any wonder that the labor question was the prime cause of the Revolution?

On page 179 there is a special recommendation to the farmers "to raise sheep and increase the wool product." To this clause I would call the especial attention of Grover Cleveland, as he recommends the introduction of free wool to benefit the farmer—views just the opposit of those who created the Revolution and made us a nation.

It is a very singular thing that when we were compelled to trade with England, and shamefully imposed upon, we fought the principle and became free from it, but ever since then, at least within a few years of the termination of hostilities, there has been a strong party in America trying to do for foreign manufactures just the same as a few Tories were doing during the Revolution. To speak in favor of English goods then was considered the work of a Tory, but to talk of the great benefits of free trade now is thought to be the sign of great statesmanship. It is so generous, you see; there is so much magnanimity in it! We hav the power now to exclude foreign goods and build up America as we like, but we must be generous and allow the British lion to tear out our vitals now and then to satiate his extreme hunger.

Men were thrown into prison in Baltimore then and their goods confiscated for talking in favor of British trade; and when such goods were landed they were cast into the sea, but to-day there is a cloud of importers who would encourage the importation of every necessary article, so that they can reap a trade and profit out of the user, and they think themselvs the salt of the nation.

There is not a page in the history of the American Revolution that does not argue squarely in the face of the free trade doctrin.

I remember well that in 1842 to 1844, during the great tariff agitation, a great many persons formed resolutions to not buy any British manufactures, and I am certain that many people, and especially mechanics, pledged themselvs in Pennsylvania to not buy any but home-made tools. The manufacturing interests of America were then in a deplorable condition, owing to the compromise measures adopted during the Calhoun, Haynes, and Webster debates in Congress on this subject of importations.

President Cleveland in his free trade message said a few words which ought to open the eyes of any man on the subject; also in his speech in Philadelphia he said to the merchants: "You hav been prosperous in trade and you can afford to be generous" —thus begging the whole question.

The free trader insists that a tariff is a direct tax on the country, and especially on the farmer. There never was a more mistaken notion. It is true that it may raise the price to some extent, but while it may do this for a time, it also raises the extent and price of labor in as great a ratio, which is the poor man's purchasing power, and, at the same time, increases the price of the farmer's produce and creates a home market.

We are told that "America must seek a foreign market for her surplus, and work cheaply enough to export it." What foolishness! If England can, with her pauper labor, undersell us in our own land, how, in the name of common sense, can we compete with her in foreign markets where we must add freights and carrying costs to our products, unless we become reduced to the beggarly pay for which she gets her labor performed? Then it should be remembered that this is, after all, the principal market of the world. Giv us the exclusiv use of our own market, and I care nothing for the other markets. America is what the manufacturing nations are all after.

There is a studied unanimity among free traders in their assertion that the farmer is injured by domestic trade. They say, "Send your grain to Europe and get cheap goods in return." On the other hand, the protectionists say that "the home manufacture of goods creates a home market for the farmer, and that the benefits are mutual."

In reply to the first proposition, I will say that if the farmer was to depend entirely on a foreign market he would starve to death, or be choked off by the middle-man, called the exporter and importer, the money-lender; in other words, that it would, by increase of interest and commission rates, require a shipload of produce to net him a dollar's worth of goods in return, as Europe does not require more than a very limited amount of his products. If she was dependent on him, the case would be different, but she is not. Then, again, to attempt such a policy would draw the other half of the population into the farmer's department of labor, and thus increase his surplus to such an extent that it would be raised only to be left to rot upon the soil that produced it, while the gold cost of the small returns for goods would be jingling in the pockets of the foreigner, and the government in debt and as poor as poverty itself, tied down by the bankers, or it would be compelled to continue a system of direct taxes in a land with no money. To draw into the agricultural industry a majority of the mechanics and merchants would be the most ruinous policy that could be adopted, and yet this would be the result of a general adoption of the doctrin of free trade in America. Make twenty or thirty millions more farmers, and you surfeit the product, and create want and misery.

To illustrate the other side, a home market for the farmer, suppose a dozen farmers go into a new country and buy up land, in a number of contiguous sections, as they hav often done in Kansas and other localities. They commence farming, but are fifteen or twenty miles away from a town, city, or railroad. What is the result? And what has been the result in many cases? Why, simply this: unless mechanics and other laborers, builders and manufacturers, follow them up, and railroads are built to get their produce into a market, in a few years their little surplus is eaten up, their cash expended, and a general exhaustion follows. They find farming and not selling to be a profitless thing. They cannot liv on bread and corn alone, nor haul their surplus twenty miles to a restricted market, so that one by one they pull up stakes, sacrifice their homes to the sharper or speculator, and move to somewhere else to find a home market. For this reason thousands of abandoned homes may be had for a song, in Texas and other Southern localities, as well as in many parts of the great Western country. And what I hav here described applies to every locality under high heaven where there is no home market. It is no fancy sketch. I hav seen it and know it to be so.

The farmer and the free trade demagog will not giv these facts their true interpretation. The ranting politician will tell the farmer that the cost of such articles of comfort as he needs is owing to high tariff, and he will try to instil hatred in the breast of the farmer against the manufacturer and the mechanic, when in truth, if the manufacturer and mechanic could hav located about the same time, their benefits would hav been mutual, the one creating a home market for the products of the other, which is the only sure success possible.

I know some friends who started out, a colony of farmers only; they took up excellent land in Kansas, and for want of a home market, railroad, etc., in less than ten years they all left the original quarters, and some of them hav moved several times, and of course they are all very poor indeed, yet each man had several thousands of hard cash when he left old Pennsylvania.

I know of other parties who started in a similar way, composed of mechanics and merchants; they located near a railway, although their lands cost them a trifle more; they soon formed a center, and laid out town lots, each party buying and holding a share according to his means, and to-day we find a thriving village, and this village will soon be a splendid city, every one of the original projectors well fixed, and plenty of work for builders to do, while the farmer has his market mostly under his own door, and easy outlet for his surplus, when he has to spare. Look upon this picture and then upon that.

A community composed in this way must thrive and prosper. When a free trader begins to curse the tariff and tells the farmer that he can do without the mechanic and merchant and laborer, he must be viciously or inexcusably ignorant. No community has thriven or ever will thrive unless it is about equally composed of farmers and other kinds of laborers. This givs the home market which the protectionist wants, and which the farmer cannot do without.

When our coal mines are in a flourishing state the farmer comes in and readily disposes of his produce at fair prices, as in good times the laborer needs twice as much to feed his hungry children as when work is slack and penury pinches his purse. Do not flatter yourself that the poor families must eat and liv anyway. I say that they will consume twice as much in good as in hard times of food, clothing, and all else required.

Can the farmer find his foreign market when the men are out of employ? Can he sell his goods when our shops and furnaces are idle, and grim-visaged want stares us all in the face? Can the merchant, mechanic, farmer, or anybody enjoy life under such a state of society? No; a thousand times no.

Just in proportion that foreign goods of any stripe are brought into our market in competition with the home product do we reduce the amount of labor here and destroy the market of the honest farmer. The free trade policy has destroyed both in proportion to its successful introduction, and has also sent our gold out of the country and reduced the circulation of money in America.

It is a noticeable fact that just as soon as we hav become a little prosperous by means of a protectiv tariff do these noodleheads succumb to the temptations of British gold, and vote to destroy our industries on any and every pretext. They find great fault because the government happens to hav a few millions with which to pay off its debts, as though it were a sin for the United States to own a dollar. Yet, if any person should suggest such conduct or policy to be applied to themselvs, they would be the first to want to kick such a person out of their offices and call him a natural born fool. It would be in accordance with their own political teachings. I hope everyone who can will study the history of the American Revolution.

Colonel Ingersoll Helps the Actors Glorify Themselvs.

The Actors' Fund of America was six years old on Tuesday of last week, and the managers made an agreeable innovation upon the purely business aspect of former anniversaries by a celebration in the Madison Square Theater, in which music and song and oratory were commingled. The theater was crowded. President Palmer sat with a vase of flowers before him. Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll sat at his left, and Mrs. Ingersoll, with a party of ladies, was in a box. Lotta and her mother, Mrs. Leland, of Albany, and Mrs. Louisa Eldridge sat in other boxes. President Palmer entertainingly sketched the work accomplished by the fund, and paid the profession the tribute of being the most charitable on earth. The association has paid out $95.853 53, and received $146,301.19. The number relieved has been 1,509 and the number buried 332.

Colonel Ingersoll's speech was one of the finest he ever made. Applause and laughter alternately greeted the bursts of eloquence and brilliant flashes of wit.

"I hav addressed," he began, "a great many audiences in my lifetime, and I hav not the slightest doubt that in the audience I now stand before there are more brains, a greater variety of talent, and more real genius than I hav addressed in all my life. I know all about respectable stupidity, I am perfectly acquainted with the brainless wealth and success of this world, and I know, after all, how poor the world would be without the divine feeling we call genius. I know, too, that all joy springs from the love of nature. I know that all joy is what I call pagan. I hav an immense sympathy with the whole human race, and of that feeling, of that spirit, the drama is born. People must first be in love with life before they can think of worthily representing it.

"Whenever a country becomes prosperous—and this has been pointed out many times—when a wave of wealth runs over the land, behind you will see all the sons and daughters of genius. The stage is born, and we like it because we love life; and he who likes the stage has a double life. One great thing the stage does is to cultivate the imagination, and the imagination constitutes the great difference between human beings and animals. The imagination is the mother of pity—the mother of every possible virtue.

"And now I am going to say a few words—because I hav the chance—on what is known as orthodox religion. That has always been the enemy of the theater. It has been the enemy of every possible comfort, of every rational joy, that is to say, of amusement. And there is a reason for this. For if that religion be true there should be no amusement. If you believe that in every amusement is the peril of eternal pain, don't amuse yourselvs. Stop the orchestra, ring down the curtain, and be as miserable as you can. That idea puts an infinit responsibility upon the soul, and how can there be any hearty joy after that? You might as well pile all the Alps on one unfortunate ant and then say, 'Why don't you play? Enjoy yourself.'

"The orthodox are the enemies of the stage. They say: 'Don't amuse yourself. Be as miserable as you can.' Their idea would make life a long dock, running away out into the ocean, upon which you should sit, with your trunk packed, waiting for the ship of death to come along. They make life a kind of greenroom, in which you are getting ready to play—somewhere else. I love the joy-makers.

"You remember the story of 'Great Expectations.' I presume you hav all had them. There is another thing about this profession—a dreadful uncertainty. I love joy-makers, and not those solemn, mournful wretches; and, when I think of the church asking the theater to be moral, I remember that story in 'Great Expectations' of the bride that was always ready for the bridegroom that never came, and who brought in little Pip and told him to play.

"If this doctrin be true, every actor is in about that situation. I hav always loved the theater and the stage, simply because it added to the happiness of this life. But they say it is immoral. Now, I believe that everything in the world that tends to make men happy is moral. Everything that buds and blossoms and breathes the breath of joy is moral. Nobody can be more immoral than to want your own life sour as well as others.

"There was a religious gathering in the Metropolitan Opera House recently. It was voting for the election of bishops. The voters voted forged and fraudulent ballots, and afterward these voters asked that old, old question, 'Is the theater moral?'"

Colonel Ingersoll then spoke of the dignity of the profession, and sat down amid tremendous applause

Mr. Dion Boucicault made everybody laugh when he said that while Mr. Ingersoll had been making his address he had been learning a lesson in brevity He would seek to emulate the colonel. He had always understood that an author was an improvident creature, and an actor eminently improvident, while an Irishman might be described as preëminently so. Mr. Boucicault continued that he had a young friend who presented in himself all these conditions, and it had been his wish to introduce him to the audience somewhat after the fashion in which a sample inebriate is exhibited at a temperance meeting to make you feel the horror of the circumstances.

He was unable to do this, but would read a letter from his friend. Here it is:

In these modern and degenerate days our authors, having no respect for the traditions of literature nor the illustrious examples of improvidence held up to us by Sheridan, Goldsmith, and Grub street generally—but rather emulating the sordid and (lately proved to be) disreputable impostor, Shakspere, hav, like him, become men of substance—without fear of a future Donnelly before their eyes, they hav, like him, become respectable. Actors seem to forget they are rogues and vagabonds, by act of Parliament, and presume to hav bankers' accounts, to pay their scores, to introduce great public charities, to contribute to build churches, to perform a thousand services to society—which society graciously receives and acknowledges on the door-mat.

"The Ancient and Bohemian Guild of the Stage meets no more in a public house," said Mr. Boucicault. "The modern and thrifty Capuchin of the drama has its clubs, its funds, its home. Melpomene gets her dresses from Paris, and her sister is worth $1 000 000. Thrift, thrift, Horatio! What is thrift? It means keeping what you've got and investing it in first class security. There is the old fashioned form. A man hoards his gains, accumulates a fortune—that he may leave a big lump of money for his legatees to divide, dispute, and enjoy.

"Suppose I leave $10 000 to the Actors' Fund. Up comes some heir of mine who employs a distinguished lawyer to prove I am a crank. There would be no difficulty about that. Scores of actors and actresses who hav suffered torment under my stage management would testify heartily to it. Then this eminent orator, who never lost a case, even when Gladstone was his opponent in the ring, would prove me as mad as Nebuchadnezzar, and walk off with my $10 000. A suit against a dead man is a sure thing; he can't testify in his own behalf.

"Now, there's another kind of thrift which seems to me the most thrifty. Put out your money while you liv and can see what becomes of it, watching the good it does. If there's any doubt about your wits, or what you intended to do, you're there to settle the dispute, and then you are one too many for the law. This is the wisest of thrift, it is the best kind of security. You get discount on the transaction right here and compound interest hereafter. I suppress the signature of the letter," concluded Mr. Boucicault, "but he calls himself a Nihilist—because he's got nothing—and so is free from prejudice in disposing of the goods of other people."

Welcome, Stranger.

From Life.

"Beloved brethren," said a watering-place minister from his pulpit, "it fills my heart with joy to see among us so many strangers on this blessed Sabbath morning. To those who are away from home, bent upon pleasure or seeking health, as the case may be, we extend a cordial and heartfelt greeting. The collection will now be taken up."

Organization and Reconciliation.

DEAR MACDONALD: I wish you would print the subjoined letter I wrote to Mr. Green, and his reply, both of which appear in the Freethinkers' Magazine for June:

DEAR FRIEND GREEN: Nothing since entering upon the duties of secretary has given me greater satisfaction, or made me feel more profoundly grateful, than your two hearty, generous, yes, magnanimous letters. Those letters prove that you recognize principles as vastly superior to men, and that whenever you firmly believe that the fundamental work of this organization—the Nine Demands of Liberalism—will be faithfully practicalized to the full extent of the means furnished, you are ready to fall into line, losing sight of any preconceived prejudice or former antagonism. We are all liable to be misunderstood, but there is one common ground of agreement—we can be reconciled with the Nine Demands for the unification of all the Liberal elements. To that end my course in the future as well as the past is directed. You can play as brilliant a role prospectivly as you hav retrospectivly, for the welfare and prosperity of the American Secular Union, and that is in urging this reconciliation.

The same original platform is all that we present—the identical opposition to ecclesiastical encroachment. Organization is as absolutely imperativ to the development of state Secularization now as it was in 1876. All must admit that local organization can never be effectiv without a national nucleus to foster, encourage, and sustain. It would be simply superfluous occupancy of time to elaborate on the necessity of organization, when the foe shows such a formidable front from that fact alone, and by which means it curbs, crushes, and muzzles modern thought, and presents an effectiv barrier to further intellectual progress. The course of events proves clearly that Secularization is the foundation of all true reform, social and political. Where ecclesiasticism holds people in mental bondage there is little hope for the cause of human justice, and social equality must ever sink in the background. It is this mental bondage which makes the long suffering, patient, ignorant multitude bear with temporal hardships for a promis of eternal bliss Thus the altar and the throne hav been inseparable, and the surpliced priest ever ready to bless the sceptered tyrant.

Never in the history of our own country was the Roman church so powerful, proud, defiant, and dangerous. Never has it been so openly antagonistic to the principal feature of American freedom—public schools. Never was a time when leading politicians were so willing to wallow at the feet of priests. Never a time when the spirit of freedom was so little recognized in our national life or exercised by our lawmakers. The cohorts of the God-in-the state party are activ in the camp of the Young Men's Christian Association; they hav captured the Prohibition party; they control the Female Suffrage movement, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is one of their strongholds. It is natural, therefore, that Freethinkers should be first to take alarm at the attitude of this fell destroyer of mental freedom, ecclesiasticism; that they should haste to counteract its despotic tendencies; but they should remember that our platform is as broad as the principle of justice. Secularism is the antithesis of sectarianism. It is not merely one for Freethinkers, Agnostics, Materialists, Spiritualists, or Atheists, but one which every honest man and intelligent woman can indorse—one which every true American citizen should seek to secure, and it is the duty of every Secularist to invite and retain their interest, sympathy, and coöperation.

There never was more need for activity, unity, and harmony than now on the part of all true Secularists, and I appeal to you, as one who can materially aid in bringing that about, to giv it the approval of your voice and pen. We hav had a protracted internecine war while our enemies are welding the chains for our complete subjugation. Let us work while yet we may. The secretary has not always cordially agreed with everything done by the National Liberal League or the American Secular Union, but he considered it simply childish to withdraw from an instrumentality for good to the whole country, to the time and the race, because some particular policy did not suit him. Liberalism should be made of sterner stuff. Our duty to the cause should be held much higher, nobler, and greater than any individual opinion. Can you call such back from their sleep of indifference to the crying need of the hour? We hav men and women of culture, character, and unquestioned ability; these should be sent out as missionaries to organize, for organization will be necessary to precede action. Literature needs to be thickly scattered over the country, but Liberals should blush at the beggarly sum which has thus far been realized for that purpose. Can we not get the Liberals to rise superior to the past, join forces, and once more, shoulder to shoulder, fight the common foe of Universal Mental Liberty? Fraternally, E. A. STEVENS.

MR. GREEN'S REPLY.

We publish on another page a private letter we recently received from E A. Stevens, secretary of the American Secular Union. We take that letter as our text for a few comments on the work of the Secular Union. The Union, as all our readers know, is what was formerly the National Liberal League. That League was organized at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876. Its platform was the Nine Demands of Liberalism. For a number of years we were chairman of the executiv committee of that society, and during that time we labored with all the power we possessed to build up the organization. The first rebuff that the society met with was at the Syracuse congress, held in 1878, when Mr. Abbott and his friends attempted to commit the organization to the doctrin of the "modification" of what were known as the Comstock laws, and, failing to do so, withdrew from the congress. The next year the congress met in Cincinnati and proved a great success. Colonel Ingersoll was chairman of the committee on resolutions, and introduced a series that appeared to satisfy all parties. They were unanimously adopted, and great harmony prevailed. This was the largest and most successful congress that the organization has ever held. Nearly every state in the Union was well represented. We remember that at a meeting of the National Executiv Committee some twelve states were represented. Everybody went away from that convention greatly elated and encouraged and with bright anticipations for our success in the future. A large number of the delegates at Cincinnati went direct to the New York State Freethinkers' Convention at Chautauqua Lake, where hundreds of Liberals assembled, and where we had another grand five days' meeting. We well remember that Colonel Ingersoll said to us at the close of the Cincinnati congress: "This has been the most successful gathering Liberals hav ever had in this country." The next year the congress was held at Chicago, where resolutions were introduced committing the organization to the doctrin of the total repeal of the Comstock laws, and after a warm discussion, were adopted. On their adoption, Colonel Ingersoll, the writer, and others withdrew. Our position from the first was that the society should not, as a society, be committed to either "repeal" or "modification," but that each individual member should be at liberty to favor either "repeal," "modification," or neither. This proved another great blow to the organization, from which we think it has never fully recovered.

We hav not here repeated this well-known history of the movement to find fault with anyone. We hav no doubt but that each party acted in accordance with his earnest convictions. It seemed to be, for the time being, an "irrepressible conflict" that could not be avoided. But it is now a part of the past history of the movement, and only as such do we here refer to it. But we are glad to know that those questions that proved so disastrous to our success as an organization in the past hav been permanently settled, and that the last congress that met at Chicago fully recognized the fact, and placed the association again squarely on the platform of the Nine Demands of Liberalism, the same platform that was formulated by Francis E. Abbott, the founder of the association. We said, editorially, immediately after that congress closed, "If the officers elected will carry out, in good faith, what they hav adopted as their platform, ignoring all other questions, they ought to succeed—they ought to hav the united support of all the Liberals and friends of state Secularization in this country and Canada." Since then we hav watched them closely, especially the course of Mr. Stevens, the secretary, and we rejoice to say that no one could hav done better than he has. He went to work immediately after his appointment to organize the country on this old platform of the Nine Demands, and he has proved a faithful steward of our cause. He has not had the support he should hav had, for the reason probably that many had lost faith in the organization. He has, with the help of Mrs. Freeman and other activ Liberals of Chicago, built up a very large, activ Union in that city, the influence of which is felt over the whole country. He has issued many valuable pamphlets that set forth clearly the importance of this Secular movement and the work necessary to be done. He has written thousands of letters to Liberals in all portions of the country urging them to get up local organizations. He has, from the first, worked with a zeal and energy worthy of the great cause he is engaged in. But it is impossible for one man to do everything. He needs, and must hav, the financial and moral indorsement of every Secularist in this country to be able to make his administration a great success. And we earnestly urge each one of our readers to giv him all the aid in his power. If you cannot send him money, write him a letter of encouragement, and offer to perform any labor in your vicinity that he may require of you. If you can do nothing more, you can purchase and circulate some of his valuable pamphlets. Commence immediately after reading these lines by sending him a dollar for documents to circulate. In that way you can aid a little.

We hav here only space to add that we learn that the next Secular Congress is to be held in Pittsburgh, Pa., the last of October. As the Secular Union is now based solely on the Nine Demands of Liberalism, which we hav often characterized as the Second Declaration of American Independence, we urge every person who indorses those Demands to attend that Congress. And we hav yet to find a Liberal, of any school, who does not indorse those Demands. Every honest American must indorse them. As Mr. Stevens suggests, let us cease our bickerings, forget all our past contentions, and all go to Pittsburgh resolved to build up a great, growing organization that shall receive the support of every true Liberal, and command the respect of our opponents.

ST. LOUIS AND SECULARISM.

When the secretary of the American Secular Union arrived within the depot of "the future great," he was regaled by a complimentary serenade from a brass band, whose most conspicuous piece was a big drum operated with enthusiasm by a vigorous Teuton who seemed as though he had a corner on a patent trip-hammer movement and a reputation as a slugger to sustain. Feeling grateful, was about to respond to this commendable recognition on the part of the citizens of this modern Thebes, and while cudgeling our brains for the appropriate sentiment and clearing our throat for the preparatory "Fellow-citizens," to our utter dismay and discomfiture we discovered that music did not agree with us—it soured on our stomach. It was neither our serenade nor our funeral. This band had come to escort some Tammany braves to the great national pow-wow in the Exposition wigwam and to test their hardihood in an encounter with St. Louis fire-water.

No sign of I. S. Lee or any of the parties so anxious for my appearance in Missouri.

Town full of bustle, bluster, buncombe, and howling representativs of the unterrified Democracy. Not at all like the staid and saintly elderly maiden I had formerly known as St. Louis, Mo. A bad time to set Secularism in motion, and particularly discouraging when I learned Friday night that the letter I had written six days ahead notifying Friend Lee to make arrangements to hav God gently landed outside the state had just made its appearance that afternoon, and no preparations whatever were made. Democratic post-office officials are not expected to sober up during a political convention. Saturday morning we canvassed the hall question, making inquiries, only to be delayed till 3 P.M. before we could actually secure one, and that at nearly double the usual rates.

Brother Sidney A. Rendle, secretary, and Brother Lee did some tall "hustling" for an audience, fearing that, as the hour of agony arrived, the audience would not to any alarming extent, especially when we learned that three great picnics were to be held outside the city, and that no desirable beverages were permitted to be sold Sundays in the corporation. If there is any community in existence where beer-drinking can be commendably extenuated, it is where, when you try to drink water, you feel as though you had attempted to swallow a Mississippi sand bank. Every well-regulated St. Louisian has a natural aversion to the article there called water, not by any means because it is "too thin," but otherwise.

Reading Sunday morning papers, discovered that "Hon." E. A. Stevens, etc., was announced to lecture. Now, I was never able to "carry my ward," or succeed in breaking into the Congress, nor desirous of robbing our colored friends of their ambition to monopolize titles.

Franklin Hall was not filled, but there was a good audience, especially when quality over quantity is considered, which was demonstrated by the fact that nearly the whole audience remained after the lecture to take part in the temporary organization. Several of the attendants who should hav been mentioned I hav forgotten the names of. Sidney A. Rendle is likely to make an efficient member, as are also Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Scoville, who are highly esteemed and talented lecturers in the domain of occult science and Spiritualism. The temporary organization was formed by electing president, I. S. Lee; vice-president, Mrs. S. C. Scoville; secretary, William C. Bohannan, and a responsible-looking gentleman, whose name I cannot recall, for treasurer.

May the St. Louis Union do the grand work for which the harvest is ripe in that priest-ridden community. And my earnest hope is that Friend Lee may realize his anticipations of an organization of "one thousand members inside of three months." And so the good work goes on.

"Is Professor Leahy Persecuted?"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Under above euphonious caption, in your issue of May 19th, and over the nom de plume of "Anonymous," I find Prof. M. D. Leahy, through himself or friend, trying to blubber over and ride, martyr-like, some old spavined goat into notoriety under the cry of "persecution," for the reason that he has failed to get a sugar-tit every morning to keep the boy from crying. He takes great umbrage at the action of the board of managers of the Freethought University at Liberal, Mo., because, at the annual meeting of stockholders, on the first Tuesday in May, B. A. Bigelow was selected president of the board in his place. And for that this noble-minded youth, this exemplar of mental ability and moral worth, has resorted, under a hidden name,* to the expediency of abusing his successor in office, and then cries "persecution" because such nobleness is not appreciated by those who hav the management of the school at heart.

I take pleasure in saying that B. A. Bigelow has been a teacher a third as many years as young Leahy has lived. Mr. Bigelow is an intelligent gentleman, with a character above reproach, and is always to be found in the front ranks of Liberalism—that Liberalism that is calculated to elevate humanity, not degrade it. He is to be found on the right side of all great moral questions of the day. With those qualities and his farmer-like urbanity, the board preferred him to Professor Leahy, with his scholarly polish and pronounced teaching on temperance and other questions vital to society.

If Professor Leahy has so conducted himself as to lead fourteen of the seventeen of the board of managers to doubt his fitness to preside over the destinies of the students sent here, it is not reasonable to suppose that he is par excellence and these fourteen intended persecuting when they supplanted him with Mr. Bigelow.

The writer of that article predicts a failure of the school when Leahy leaves it. Mr. Leahy has been at the head of the school for two years, and he has succeeded in getting three non-resident students to attend. If it falls, "Oh, what a fall, my countrymen!" The board of managers hav already ordered its suspension until a proper man can be found to take it in charge.

As to the thrust at me, I will say I cannot stop to kick all the dogs that bark at my heels.

Liberal, Mo., May 29 1888. G. H. WALSER.

Common Sense on School Matters.

Hon. A. S. Draper, state superintendent of public instruction, addressed the Columbia county Teachers' Association at the Opera House, Hudson, N. Y., June 1st. Beyond being a practical talk to teachers, his remarks were of deep public interest. The substance of Mr. Draper's address was the following:

Fifty years hav made a radical change in our educational system. Formerly the theory was that the child had the right to education for the benefit of the individual; the theory now is that the child must be educated for the protection of the state. The appropriation for educational purposes by the state of New York has steadily increased from $1,000,000 in 1838 to over $15,000,000 in 1888; and no money is so cheerfully given by the taxpayers as that for public instruction.

Still, our school system is inferior to that of Germany—Germany, whose monarchical government depends on the support of a standing army—while the future welfare of our American republic depends on our common schools.

Those conducting our schools are under a tremendous responsibility. There is practical improvement needed—better school-houses, better school-teachers.

In our rural districts, especially, the school-house of fifty years ago is used to-day, though almost unexceptionally no other public building receives such constant and such necessarily severe usage. We need school-houses of modern conveniences, sanitation, and architecture, and with this end in view the state, during the past year, has offered rewards for best plans of school-buildings costing from six to fifteen thousand dollars, and these plans are now ready for distribution to interested parties.

Another important point is the primary school. While we would not discourage the attention directed toward the high school, it is a notable fact that less than five per cent of the primary pupils ever see the inside of the high school, but drift out into the world.

Let us not stand the educational pyramid on its apex. Education is to make good citizens. Therefore let the useful and practical studies be exclusivly the foundation. Ornamental and special branches can be afterward acquired, but the base-work of the primary school should be substantial, for on it all other knowledge is built.

There has been much discussion in regard to the "Bible in the public schools." Where any objection is made, the only course, in justice to all, is to "take it out." Nevertheless, morality should be taught in our schools, and this can be done most effectivly by the character and example of the teacher. Therefore, again, those conducting our schools are under a great responsibility.

The above sensible sentiments from an authoritativ source I thought interesting to all public-spirited people, and so I submit them to your readers.

Hudson, N. Y. MARY A. WORSWICK.

The Brooklyn Pooh-Bah's Propositions.

Were people to generally and openly repudiate belief in a peculiar relationship between a certain individual of past time and the creativ principle, we should all become Hottentots.

Were lamb olatry to be given up, we should reduce our women to slaves and throw our female infants into the river.

These are propositions put forth by the great Brooklyn Pooh-Bah, a few days ago, according to the papers.

Is not this going to extremities? But, then, is not the P. B. rather inclined to extremities?

Were there, then, nothing but Hottentots in the world before the Christian church predominated—no good people, no private nor public virtue, no kindness nor humanity? And were their women treated by the races from whom Europe derived its civilization as the Chinese and Hindoos treat theirs?

Did they treat their women as the church treated them during the Dark Ages? Did not the culminating power of the church relegate women to a lower position than they held in their heathen liberty?

But what is there in the New Testament—to say nothing of the great, clumsy network of moonshine mysticism and mythology of the "orthodox" brain built on it—which tends to evolve the silk clad, novel-reading, take care-of-myself, piano strumming, fanatical, but altogether delightful, female comrade of to-day?

Is she not the result of the fortunate prevalence of certain purely secular conceptions of society against which the church has ever struggled?

Is not the innate tendency of the races which hav settled the north of Europe and the United States (a thing which far preëxisted Christianity) the cause of the advanced state of Europe and America to-day? And does not this account for the difference between Europe and Asia?

Was not Christianity presented in Asia, and in Africa, and in southern Europe first? Why are they and we not alike advanced, then, if Christianity is the cause of our civilization? They embraced it, or, at least, continue to hold it, with deeper earnestness. With them it holds a far more absolute sway.

Oh! but perhaps it is not Christianity, but Protestant Christianity, that Pooh-Bah is thinking of. Well, Protestant Christianity is not quite so bad, if by it we mean only what all agree is to be found in the New Testament. But where do we find in it any of that spirit of patriotism, and manly, beneficial, human desire for society's improvement, which has led western nations to their present superiority? Is it commended? Is it not rather reproved and discouraged? And if we talk of eternal rewards and punishments, to what are these directed in that book? Well, there is a chapter that seems to apply them solely to mercy and the want of it. But even before the Jesus who is supposed to hav uttered this in the early part of his career had finished that career, he seems to hav forgotten this sweet and simple doctrin, and to hav begun calling upon the lightning to scorch and blast all who dared refuse his selfish demands for divine honors.

None better than P. B. knows that neither the Sermon on the Mount nor the parable of the sheep and the goats contains the salvation principles of to-day's Protestantism, though that Protestantism calls itself Christianity, and though the said sermon and parable are expressly put forth as containing all that is essential to it.

Yet, noble as are this Sermon and parable, they contained no principle new to the world at that time, neither are they of themselvs sufficient to produce a civilization like ours, though they tend to remove obstacles to human progress. It needs positiv race-qualities to carry a people upward. A great deal had to be added to the mild, negativ virtues inculcated in the Sermon and parable above named to make an England, and a New England; and the blood did that—not the blood of Jesus, but the blood of the Jutes and Angles, and of the nobler human strain destined, long before his time, to found free constitutions, under which, and under which alone, flourishes man in his noblest state.

Take away, then, your cumbersome theology; your lamb, your virgin, your tailed devil; your arbitrary, inhuman, unjust, and unsubstantiated dogmas, and your traditions resting on nothing worth the name of evidence, and totally irrelevant and inconsequential even if true, and do you think really, seriously, this race would then lapse into barbarism? P. B., your analogies are such as any fool can invent, but they prove nothing!

Amen and amen, glory, hallelujah.

HOPEFUL HARDPAN.

Boston's Blue Laws.

Boston Letter to Chicago Tribune.

The barbers of Boston are, as a rule, ungodly. Despite the new law which forbids them to practice their profession Sundays, their shops are still kept open seven days in the week. Nevertheless, they do no work on the Sabbath. But they gather in a good day's wages just the same, and the manner in which this happy result is accomplished is both interesting and instructiv.

The first day of the present week, at about 10 o'clock in the morning, the writer was walking along Charles street with some faint hopes of finding a tonsorial artist in pursuit of his illegal business, when he was agreeably surprised to observe a colored person, with a white apron, leaning gracefully against a red-white-and-blue pole on the nearest corner.

"Can I get a shave this morning?" inquired the customer, wistfully, pausing as he came to the spot where the gentleman from Senegambia was standing in picturesque repose.

"Yes, sah," replied the latter, courteously. "Walk right in. You'll find de implements, sah, all ready to use at the fourth cheer on de left."

The newcomer thereupon entered the shop, where he found three other men—all in a partially shaved condition—sitting on the edges of as many chairs and applying lather and steel to their own faces. The situation was quickly explained by the Ethiopian in charge, who had followed the late arrival from the sidewalk.

"You see, sah," he began, "we don't dare shave nobody a Sunday, for fear o' being locked up; but dere's no law against lendin' a razzer an' cup to a gemman friend. So, if you ike, de hospitalities of dis establishment am at your service. You'll find a cuttin' instrument wid de sharpest kind ob an edge on it in front ob de looking-glass; likewise a mug full of lather, some hot water, and a bottle o' bay rum."

"I see," responded the applicant, who, without further delay, seated himself in chair No 4 and proceeded to operate upon himself with the utensils at hand. At the end of twenty minutes or so, with some incidental laceration, he had finished his task, and the barber, having helped him on with his coat, proceeded to brush him off. Then the customer fumbled the loose change in his trousers pocket and asked, sotto voce, what the charge might be

"Nothing, sah," said the knight of the razor. "We should be took up if we asked pay for services rendered on de Sabbath." And as he spoke he gave a portentous and most expressiv wink.

"Ah, I understand," returned the guest. And, as he went out, he dropped an unostentatious fifteen cents on a little pile of coin near the doorway. All of which goes to show conclusivly that the ingenuity of an iniquitous generation is too much for the law and the prophets to contend against.

Communications.

More About the Spirits.

I hav attended two more light-circle séances. One was in a newly built house where Mr. Keeler had never been before. It had a square bay window, and this was inclosed with Mr. Keeler's curtain. The twenty selected spectators were all there before he came with his curtains, guitar, tambourine, bells, and clothes-pins. He and his assistant, Mr. Hall, put up the curtain before our eyes, as usual.

The séance had been arranged to take place at another house near by, but at the last moment a change had to be made, and the landlady assured us that she yielded to the request to hav it at her house with reluctance.

It was nearly 9 o'clock before the performances began. They were much the same as heretofore described. The guitar was thrummed behind the curtain, then on the covered laps of the three sitters, and at their feet. It was held up and waved from behind the curtain. It was banged about so rudely that for the next performance it had to be tied together with a cord, for it was coming apart. The tambourine was beaten in artistic style, and no drummer could hav used the two broken clothes-pins more skilfully as drumsticks than did the invisible hands behind the curtain. And all these things were done while Mr. Keeler's two hands grasped the left arm of the lady or gentleman next to him, whose right arm was held by the left hand of the third sitter. So the sitters declared repeatedly during the performances.

At least forty written messages were received by one or another of us. They were generally thrown over the curtain, but a few actually came through it. As they came the manager would read the signature and pass it to the person who recognized it. The movement of the pencil could be heard behind the curtain by those of us who sat near it, and everybody could hear the tearing off of the leaf as the message was completed. I received one from my sister Selina.

Many materialized hands appeared protruding through and over the curtain. Some of these were small, like the hand of a child. Several of the company went up and shook the hands. One would be warm, another cold. A hand came out near Mr. Keeler's feet and was grasped by several persons in turn, and while it was thus held four or five other hands were visible above. I sat within eight feet of the curtain, and if I did not see four hands at one time I never saw anything in my life.

Mr. Keeler's coat was taken off by invisible hands and thrown over onto the floor, while his two hands grasped the arm of the next sitter, as the latter assured us.

The last of the four light-circle séances that I attended was in Mr. Keeler's parlor. About twenty-five persons were there. The usual performances were repeated. Two or three small rents in the curtain were sewed up by Mrs. Keeler before our eyes, after it was hung. The broken guitar had to be tied together at the large end with a cord. At the first change of sitters a young lady and myself were chosen by the spirit guide, as indicated by three raps when the manager pointed to us and we asked, "Do they want me?" The young lady sat next to Mr. Keeler, and I held her right wrist in my left hand, my other hand and arm being free and exposed to view. I felt hands on my back, sometimes patting me on the shoulder. I put my free right hand up to my left shoulder and took hold of the spirit hand. I could feel the fingers and thumb distinctly through the cloth. The hand was under the flap, as if it had come through the curtain, but it was not visible. Pretty soon I felt it fumbling about my left shoulder as if in search of something. Then my handkerchief, which was in the outside breast pocket of my coat, came flying out, and fell upon the floor in front of me. My wife picked it up and was glad that she had given me a clean one just before we started from home. She thinks the handkerchief came through the curtain, but if it was thrown over from behind the curtain, the mystery is all the same. Or even if it came only from under the flap of the curtain, it was a physical impossibility for Mr. Keeler's hand to reach it, much less the hand of the young lady, whose right wrist I was holding, and who declared that Mr. Keeler's two hands held her left arm all the time. Every one of the twenty-five spectators will attest what I hav written.

While I sat there messages were written on pads behind the curtain. I could hear the sound of the pencil, and everyone in the room could hear the tearing off of the leaves. More than twenty of these messages came to different persons present and were recognized. The following was for me:

> We havn't much room to write in here. Two of us can write at a time, and the other waiting ones crowd and hurry us. David M. Burr, per G. C.

G. C. answers for George Christy. Another paper came on which was written merely a name. The manager read it, "Selina and Charlotte." For a moment no one responded. Then I said, "Selina may be my sister, but Charlotte I do not recognize." There was a mistake in reading it; the next paper that came over had the name repeated, but written on two lines—first Selina and then S. Churchill.

Before the séance ended General Lippitt, with whom I am acquainted, was permitted to go behind the curtain. As he stood inside the inclosure, directly back of Mr. Keeler, his head and shoulders were visible. The spirit hands came out as before through the curtain, and he assured us that there was no form or substance visible behind. He was asked to raise both hands, and he did so. Still the spirit hands appeared. The guitar, tambourine, and bell were also sounded, sometimes two at once. He told us he could see the instruments move as the sounds were produced.

Two other men were in turn permitted to look over the curtain while General Lippitt was standing behind it. One of them said he also saw the instruments move without the contact of visible hands. The other was not so favored; whenever he looked over the sounds ceased.

General Lippitt is the gentleman whom we saw at the dark circle sit on the knee of a spirit. We asked him who that spirit was, and he said, Governor Chittenden. This, he said, was not the first time that the governor had appeared to him.

Mr. Keeler's coat was taken off during the evening, as before. I hav seen this done four times.

The wife of my only living brother was present at this séance. She is visiting us, and had never seen anything of the kind before. She was allowed to shake the hand of a spirit, and she believes it was the hand of my brother David, from the peculiarity of the grasp. My wife also was allowed to grasp a hand. As she did so she asked, "Is it father?" and the response was several shakes. His manner of handshaking was also peculiar, and she recognized it in the spirit hand.

It seems unnecessary for me to discuss the question of the possibility of fraud in the slate-writing. The bringing in of a telegram by Mrs. Keeler might look suspicious, but it did not happen again when my wife went there; no one entered the room except her aunt. And even if Mr. Keeler did not actually rub out his own writing on one of my slates, he certainly did not write on the other one; and on that other slate, at the second tying, I got a message from my brother, signed David M. Burr, in which was written the name of our sister Selina.

This second writing I omitted to mention in my first letter. And I will now add that after my wife got her slate-writing, Mr. Keeler was influenced to write with his own hand on the two vacant surfaces of the slates the names, David Burr and Selina Churchill. Those names had not been written or mentioned by Mrs. Burr, nor did Mr. Keeler know her name, much less that she was my wife. Indeed, he did not remember me when I afterward spoke to him at the close of a séance, until I reminded him of my having had some slate-writing, and that I addressed one question to a living person.

This article I expected to be the last on the subject of Spiritual phenomena, but my wife has attended another dark circle where the materialization was more complete and convincing than before, and she will describe what she saw. W. H. Burr.

Washington, D. C., May 28, 1888.

Sense and Spiritualism.

For several years I hav been a subscriber to The Truth Seeker, and hav watched its course with great pleasure, as I recognized that the policy it pursued would commend it to all Liberals, at least to all deserving that name.

I hav read letters from various friends, denouncing this or upholding that, withdrawing their subscriptions or sending additional ones according to their personal views of the pictures by Heston; and, being somewhat acquainted with the trials and tribulations of editorial work, hav sympathized with Brother Macdonald in his efforts to uphold a free press and free speech, by keeping his columns open for a decent discussion of any live topic, without compromising the dignity of his paper or affiliating with either side.

At times the subject of Spiritualism, which has already attracted the attention of millions of intelligent women and men, was touched on, but never, as it seems to me, was it given that field which its increasing interest to humanity demands.

Science declines to investigate its claims, and Infidels scout at it, each seeming to hav a particular and peculiar antipathy to the very name of medium. All manner of crimes are imputed to these sensitivs, and the charge of immorality seems to hover over each and every one; the better and grander the character, the more immoral she invariably is.

I do not propose any labored defense of the Spiritual philosophy, as possibly I may not be equal to the task, but as I studied and investigated it from a business man's standpoint, bringing to bear on it every resource I was capable of, and was compelled to accept its teachings, possibly my view of it may be acceptable to those of the readers of The Truth Seeker who are interested in the statements lately made by Mr. Burr and wife.

Now, I claim that it is hardly necessary to argue as to the existence of mediums. Physiology teaches the existence of sensitivs, and anyone who has witnessed a mesmeric entertainment knows how fully the subject is under control of the operator.

So, to properly appreciate the operation of the psychological law, through and by which the medium is controled, it is fair to presume that one must understand somewhat the status of the next world, if there be one. Here evolution, twin sister to Spiritualism, steps in and givs us an insight.

As we hav come from the lower, so we ascend to the higher. All nature's laws, as far as we know them, are fixed, unchanging. Our friends, when they leave us, simply advance one round on the ladder of progress. They hav become neither gods nor angels, but remain women and men, with the same likes, dislikes, and prejudices that they had when here. A murderer may hav died even in the arms of Jesus himself, but he is still a murderer in heart, and will remain so till he has evoluted out of that condition.

This is the simon-pure teaching of evolution, and I doubt if any scientist can successfully dispute it.

Now, if this be a fact—and it looks reasonable to me—then this great psychological law has opened a way, free alike to saint and sinner, and the great cry about the immorality of mediums is "a tempest in a teapot;" for, he being operated upon by unseen forces, any act of the poor sensitiv should be viewed with charity.

I do not pretend for one moment to defend immorality, whether in a medium or any other person. That there are moral and immoral mediums, none can deny; but I claim that, as far as my experience goes with that class, the latter are in a very small minority.

Morality and mediumship are no more synonymous than morality and religion, than morality and Infidelity. Most Infidels are moral; none are religious; and the few immoral ones do not detract from the morality of the many.

In viewing these matters, I prefer the optimistic side. With our present surroundings, we are just as good as we can be; and if one man be better than his neighbor, it is due to his opportunities, and to them alone. So, if my proposition be true, we must, as a certain philosopher held, commence the education of a child "a hundred years before its birth;" then we will hav more morality.

There is another and very important fact, in connection with mediums. Of the many thousands, public and private, no two seem to be developed alike. So, if it be "thaumaturgy," as Mrs. Slenker intimates, then Spiritualism most certainly has demonstrated that fully twenty-five per cent of humanity are unconscious prestidigitators.

Mrs. Slenker seems to hav been somewhat unfortunate in her investigations. Mayhap the headlines to her article may be the keynote. She may possibly remember hearing of that Frenchman who, on falling into the water, cried out, "I will drown; nobody shall save me." I say this in all kindness to Mrs. Slenker, but I think that when she headed her article,

> A man convinced against his will
> Is of the same opinion still,

she showed the same intolerant spirit which imbued the Seybert Investigating Committee—a spirit which, I respectfully submit, should never be entertained by a Liberal when treating on any subject.

It is the same spirit that religion has inculcated in her followers; the same spirit that deluged our earth with blood, in support of the various myths; the same spirit that caused Torquemada to lay his heavy hand on humanity.

But various people hav widely different experiences with any given medium, and under circumstances which seemingly tend to the suspicion of fraud. I am now speaking of genuin mediums.

Well, what of it? Are our experiences here always the same? I opine not.

A few years ago, in the Crawford House, Boston, I was attracted to a group of gentlemen gathered around an old soldier, who was giving his experience in the battle of Fair Oaks. I followed his recital with great interest, as I was a participant in the same fight. Finally he reached a point in his recital where he touched on the fact that a handful of our men, at a critical juncture, seized on a small log-house and from that vantage-ground so distressed the enemy that they retired, and thus the battle, on that part of the field, was gained. After he was through, one of his listeners announced that he also had been present at the same battle, and while he admitted that some of the points were correct, yet he held that in the main they were wrong. The argument lasted over an hour. Each was certain of the correctness of his account. Yet I know both were wrong; at least, I think I do, for the simple reason that I was the officer in command of the men referred to.

Now, let us suppose that mediumship be true, and that these two gentlemen and myself were, in turn, communicating through a medium, and on the above subject. These gentlemen would each insist on the correctness of his statement—and here I wish to say that I believe each one honestly thought himself correct—and I would giv an altogether different version. What would be the position of the medium? How about her character for truth?

Of the teachings of Spiritualism no true Spiritualist need be ashamed. There is nothing in the philosophy but of the most ennobling nature. There is no savior. Each works and builds for himself. And I will add, it is the only system that grants, nay, insists on, woman's occupying that position which nature intended her to fill.

We hav, unfortunately, some excrescences. One is named Christian Spiritualism; and another, a trifle lower on the same limb, though denying the Godhead of the Judean savior, yet calls him "our elder brother." For these we are indebted to the church, and whatever crudities—and Spiritualism is credited with many—we are charged with are traceable to early Christian teachings.

I had the pleasure of many sittings with John Pierpont, who has "passed over" many years. Most Bostonians know him by reputation—a sturdy truth seeker; an honest man.

We conversed on many philosophical subjects, and I gained much valuable information from him in the two years I was thus privileged. When the time for my departure arrived, I naturally felt grateful for all his kindness, and so expressed myself, asking, at the same time, what I could do to prove that I was grateful. "My son, liv up to your highest aspirations," was the answer. This is the embodiment of the Spiritual philosophy.

But many are so constituted that a philosophy will not commend itself to them. They accept evolution because they hav been laughed out of their old theological views. For these there are the various phenomena. Now, I do not mean to claim that all these manifestations are genuin. There are frauds, undoubtedly. All Spiritualists admit it. Just so long as the almighty dollar is more highly valued than truth, just so long fraud will exist. But it should be remembered that most of the frauds are exposed by Spiritualists.

And even if only one manifestation in a million be true, science should investigate that one and demonstrate it to the public. But science says Spiritualism is a humbug. Let us see.

Everyone knows that Sir Isaac Newton was made a scientific saint, not only for the discovery, but for the demonstration, of the law of gravitation. That law is too well known to be discussed here. But come with me into yonder séance room. We find a plain deal table, and neither springs, cords, nor confederates. The investigators sit around it at a distance of, say, six feet, and, without any physical contact, it moves, and by its actions answers mental questions and delivers communications from those who hav crossed the mysterious river.

Will science investigate this uprooter of the Newtonian theory? No. The big-wigs are as much wedded to Newton as a Catholic to his patron saint.

Again. The law of acoustics is equally as well known as that of gravitation. Listen. That same inanimate deal table givs forth sounds sharp and clear. There is no physical contact.

By the regulation of the sounds, answers are given to mental questions, thus showing not only a power, but also an intelligence.

Will science investigate this and add to its knowledge of acoustics? No; for experience has taught science that those who investigate become convinced, and the more scientific the investigator, the surer he is of becoming convinced.

Not many years ago, Spiritualism was making great headway among the upper classes in England. The London Times came out in a "leader" denouncing it, and finished by saying it was a shame and disgrace that, with a learned society in their midst, composed of the most brilliant minds in the country, such a humbug should be allowed to take so strong a hold on the people, and called on the learned professors to "explode the fraud."

In consequence, this society appointed a committee with full power to investigate and report. On this the Times became jubilant, and assured its reader that the humbug would be exposed within thirty days.

But the thirty days passed, as also did several other thirty days. The professors had become interested, and when they did make their report announcing the phenomena to be facts, and all that Spiritualists claimed for them, the Times merely said, "Three more d——d fools." Yes! three more fools.

Wallace, the peer of Darwin.

Varley, the king of electricians.

Crookes, second to no chemist in the world.

Here, in America, we hav a sample of the same class of work in the action of the Seybert commission; particularly the scientific investigation of one of their number, who could think of no other way of testing it than by sitting for several months with a damp cloth on his head, and finally winding up by visiting Germany to inquire into the sanity of Professor Zoellner.

No one can reasonably doubt the existence of the phenomena. Each one is fully entitled to determin their worth. As you justly remark, Brother Macdonald, "Spiritualism should not be made a religion. If true, it must be in conformity with the laws of nature, and as such must come in the domain of experimental and demonstrable science."

This is simon-pure Spiritualism. But, if science will not investigate, what then?

I claim, and, if necessary, think I can prove, that the phenomena hav been known to all nations as far back as we hav any record. None knows the truth of this better than the higher ecclesiastics of the Catholic church, and I here boldly say that the majority of her so-called holy men and women were merely mediums.

Take St. Theresa, for instance. She was canonized because angels, unseen of course, were in the habit of levitating her, and the stigmata would appear on her arm, taking the shape of a cross.

Now, not many years ago, the medium Home, while holding a séance in the upper part of a private house, was lifted and carried out through one window, and back into the room through another window. This is attested by some of the highest nobility in England. Moreover, at the house of Alvin Adams, at that time president of the Adams Express Company, a piano was elevated and carried through his parlor. I merely mention these instances, out of many hundreds, as they are, to some extent, public property.

As far as the stigmata are concerned, Charles Foster, the well-known American medium, seldom, if ever, gave a sitting in which the stigmata did not appear on his arm, either in the form of the name of his unknown sitter, or of one of his departed friends.

Theresa is a saint and Home and Foster are humbugs. One might go on for an eternity reciting instances, but what would it avail? My experience could be of no possible use to another, only just so far as it corroborated his experience.

But, Brother Macdonald, you advocate a scientific inquiry. Cui bono? These investigations seldom, if ever, pan out. I could recite many. Let me giv another, at the risk of tiring you.

A little over a year ago a society was formed in England for this purpose. A medium was summoned. and a number of sittings were held. The sitters made their own conditions and the phenomena took place, They were dumbfounded. It would not do to admit the fact, as any ordinary fellow could attest to an "effect," but they were searching for the "cause." So, one who had read Henry Ward Beecher's report on the knee joints of the Fox girls bethought him of a still more novel idea. "These phenomena are caused," said he, "by the circulation of the blood in the medium's arm," and on the medium declining to be bled, he was denounced as a fraud, and all Spiritualists as cranks.

And so wags the world.

The Spiritual philosophy agrees with the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER that all its claims should be carefully, closely, and scientifically investigated. If true, it has nothing to fear. If false, I for one want to know it, and want that knowledge as soon as possible.

But how are you to investigate? Are you going to say, as many do, "If my dead friend wishes to tell me anything, he knows where I am, and he can giv it to me personally?" If so, brother Infidels, don't start in. Remember there is nothing supernatural about this philosophy. If true now, it has always been true. It is as old as the hills, and as easily demonstrable. Only go about it right. There are no ghosts in it, either holy or otherwise, only those who hav gone before. And believe me, if you giv them a chance they will be too glad to come to you.

If you want to send a telegram, you go to the telegraph office. Then, go to the Spiritual telegraph office. Keep your eyes and ears open, and, mark me, you will receive evidences. Commence, as I did, at the lower rung of the ladder; for I had thirty-six sittings in my own house, with a private medium, before I fully accepted even the raps and table-tilting.

Avoid the higher phases, such as materialization, till you hav seen and heard enough to satisfy you that such a thing as materialization is possible. Go on slowly, carefully, and I will guarantee success. I never knew it to fail.

I hav written, Brother Macdonald, much more than I had intended, possibly more than you will care to print, or, if printed, more than some may care to read. But, as I sat in my room, suffering from a severe sprain, I hav allowed my thoughts to flow, and hope these few fragmentary remarks may be of service to some poor fellow who is really seeking light.

But I am not yet through. You know me to be somewhat of a speculator—in ideas—and somewhat skeptical withal. So much so, in fact, that, at times, I doubt nearly everything. I even doubted Brownson's psychological argument, quoted by Waterloo Lambert, and after that, I can reasonably be excused doubting anything.

I noticed in the last edition of Freethought that "George" had had an experience with a slate-writing medium. I read his account carefully, but do not think he did himself justice. The deductions were somewhat far-fetched. While reading it I bethought me of an experiment, and hav selected "George" as the subject, for the following reasons:

First, I do not know him personally, although I do very well by reputation. The "man with the badge-pin" has enabled me to pass many a pleasant hour. Consequently, I feel drawn toward him.

Then, I hav never been in San Francisco, and I do not know the medium with whom he sat, and even the name has escaped me.

Now, I make the following proposition to George: Go to a stationer and buy two large slates. Cleanse them perfectly and place between them a piece of slate pencil about the size of a grain of wheat. Then take twelve (12) screws and screw three into each end and side. Thus the slates will be perfectly secure from any human effort to open them. Then take, say six small pieces of paper, such as Freethought is printed on, and on each of these write the full name of some dead friend. Roll these papers up carefully, each one separate, and place them in an envelope. All this to be done in your own house, no one near you, and with no possibility of anyone knowing the names.

Then call on the medium. Never let the slates leave your hand. As the little papers will be thoroughly mixed, it is fair to presume that even you will not know the name on any given one.

I merely suggest these precautions. If you wish to adopt any others, you are free to do so; only be sure that you hav guarded yourself so that no known human ingenuity can hoodwink you.

At the end of the séance pay the medium his fee. I should like to hav it understood right here that, whatever the result may be, it is to be published in Freethought, and you are at liberty to make any comments you desire. Only, remember, in advance, that you are at liberty to surround yourself with every safeguard, and, if the medium will allow it, you can hav a friend or two at the sitting.

I should like an engraving of the slates (and writing, if any) made, and printed with the article. Now, as it is claimed that the phenomena occur independent of the medium, it is possible that the first or even second sitting may be unproductiv, so I would wish three different sittings, unless a result were obtained sooner.

I should also like fifteen copies of Freethought, containing the article, sent me, and at the same time a bill of the entire expenses, and I will remit at once.

Now, this is a fair proposition, Brother Macdonald, and "George" need not for one moment consider himself under any pecuniary obligation to me. I hav many friends out his way, and I willingly pay for his experiment, if by so doing I can find a good slate-writing medium on the Pacific coast. Moreover, whenever I find a friend who is really desirous of investigating, I always send him to some previously tested medium, with the understanding that unless satisfactory I am to pay the bill.

In this case I make an exception. I volunteer to pay the bill no matter what may be the result.

McARTHUR.

Echoes from the Methodist Conference.

From the Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegram.

They hav combines, electioneering, and ballot-box stuffing at the election of bishops at the Methodist Episcopal general conference—all the adjuncts of a political campaign, except letters of declination.

From Puck.

If even Methodist ministers, with the fear of the Lord in their eyes, cannot be trusted to use the ballot honestly, what on earth is to be expected of a poor, unregenerate devil of a "rum-cursed" ward politician, anyhow?

From Tidbits.

Deacon's wife: "I don't see, John, why the ladies of the church cannot hav a voice in the voting for the vestry?"

Deacon: "Nonsense! What do you women know about such matters?"

Deacon's wife: "Not much, I suppose, John. We can only build the church, look after the missions, invent methods of paying off the debt, and giv up our time to such trifles; but when it comes to selecting the proper officers to stand around and say 'Amen!' to it all, it requires the colossal mind of man to grasp the situation."

From Life.

When the Metropolitan Opera House was vacated by the Methodist conference at an earlier hour than usual one day last week, in order that "Hamlet" might be rehearsed on the stage, Bishop Andrews found before he reached his hotel that he had left his coat. The bishop went back for it, and actually witnessed part of the rehearsal. And now what we want to know is whether he left his coat purposely, in order that he might hav an excuse to return, as the wily young man of the period sometimes leaves his walking-stick when he calls upon a girl and then has to go back after it the next day. Bishop Andrews cannot explain too soon.

The Southern Presbyterians Are Orthodox.

While the Presbyterians of England are considering the advisability of bringing their creed more nearly into harmony with the dicta of science, especially as to the creation theory, the Southern Presbyterians hav officially proclaimed their adherence to and firm belief in the legends of Genesis. This was done by the Southern Presbyterian Assembly, convened at Baltimore, May 25th.

The question was brought up by the complaint of Dr. James Woodrow against the synod of Georgia, which annulled the action of the presbytery of Augusta in acquitting him of having taught evolution in connection with the creation of the body of Adam. The matter was discussed for several days, and a full expression of opinion obtained. A few of the ministers sustained Dr. Woodrow on the ground that he taught evolution only as a probable theory, and not inconsistent with the standards of the church; but the large majority held that evolution was directly antagonistic to the Bible, and, as it had already been condemned by the church, the assembly should not reverse Presbyterian opinion. One minister from South Carolina opposed Dr. Woodrow because if the assembly voted to sustain him it would be wired all over the country that the Southern Presbyterians are in favor of evolution, "and instantly every Infidel in the land will giv three cheers for the Southern Presbyterian Assembly." Another minister, from Missouri, said he had informed himself of the latest phases of this question. He had read the reply of Professor Huxley to the bishops of England, as well as papers by other scientists, and he found "that the standard they would leave us would be a world without God and a death without resurrection." The balance of Dr. Woodrow's opponents contented themselvs with declaring that evolution and the Bible were utterly irreconcilable, and that he who believed one could not logically believe the other. The vote upholding the biblical account of the creation, or the mud theory against the monkey theory, as a daily paper puts it, was one hundred and four to thirty-four.

This result was not unexpected. The gentlemen who used to quote scripture to support slavery are not the ones to absorb new ideas. The Bible which cursed Canaan and made him a servant of servants, i. e., the slave of these reverend servants of God, is good enough for them still, and no Infidel shall hav the opportunity of accusing them of learning anything. It is well.

But while we must condemn the obstinate conservatism of the Southern Presbyterians, we must at the same time applaud their consistency and admit that the position assumed by them—that evolution and the Bible cannot both be true—is impregnable. The change in the Articles of Religion proposed by the English Presbyterians—that God fashioned the world in successiv stages—is revolutionary, and an abandonment of biblical religion. Without the Garden of Eden, and the occurrences said to hav happened therein, Calvary and the tragedy enacted thereon would be useless and without a basis. The Old Testament is the most essential of foundations for the New. We must hav the fall of man to make the atonement of service. And the "fall of man" must be mythical if the human race was not created perfect, but progressed from lower forms of life. That this antagonism of religion and science is deadly is recognized by all logical thinkers, and the tergiversations and twistings of even so eminent a theologian as Mr. Gladstone cannot avail to alter the fact. The issue is clearly stated by the editor of the Sun in considering the action of the Southern Presbyterian Assembly in this case, and the effort by the Southern General Assembly of Presbyterians to unite the Southern and Northern bodies, and it can not be too often put before those theological contortionists who twist both science and the "revealed" account in order to force an agreement. The Sun says: "Dr. Woodrow, who is especially on trial for teaching evolution, is only one among many orthodox theologians who hav been attracted by that scientific theory, so powerful in its appeal to the modern intellect generally. Yet never before has faith encountered an enemy equally dangerous, for it strikes at the very foundation of all theology, Christian or other, and shatters the corner-stone of revealed religion. According to the teachings of Christianity, of Mohammedanism, and the myths of all ancient mythologies, man's primitiv state was high and holy and happy, and he descended from it because of sin and disobedience. According to evolution, man began at the bottom, having gradually come up from a simple cell, and has grown into what he is by a slow process of development.

"The two theories, therefore, are in direct conflict, whether we interpret the scriptural story literally, as many theologians do, or as an allegory, after the manner of others, or whether we take one or the other of the conflicting accounts of the book of Genesis.

"In the first chapter of Genesis, it will be remembered, God is described as having made man as the last act of creation, giving him dominion over the animals already created; but in the second chapter the creation of Adam precedes that of the lower animals, which he is permitted to name, and which are created for his benefit. By the first account Adam and Eve were created together: 'Male and female created he them;' but the second makes Adam to hav been created first, then the various beasts, and last of all the woman.

"These differences are, of course, puzzling, but with respect to the paradisaical state of the first pair the two accounts do not disagree; and even if we take the whole as allegorical and mythical, in a sense which justifies the theory of revelation, the description is of mankind as having begun at the summit of development, and as having fallen from that state. To this evolution opposes the theory that man began at the bottom and has been struggling painfully to get up higher ever since.

"If, then, we follow evolutionary science, we must reject revelation and with it the whole system of theology: the fall of man, the origin of evil, the scheme of redemption, even the immortality of the human soul. Therefore we say that the Baltimore general assembly is dealing with a question of momentous importance to supernatural religion, a question beside which the controversy over the organic union of Northern and Southern Presbyterians sinks into insignificance."

There cannot be a more distinct issue than that between evolution and "revealed religion." If the former be true, then Christianity is not true; and if not true, it must, beyond its human characteristics and relations, be as useless as the pagan mythology from which it is essentially borrowed.

The Union of Church and State in New Jersey.

In his decision depriving Henry George of a legacy to be used for circulating his works Vice-chancellor Bird of New Jersey lays down some queer propositions. If the higher courts uphold him, a man who desires to leave money to spread heretical opinions will do well to use it before his death instead. The will contested first makes provisions for the wife of the testator and makes other disposition of a small amount of his property, and then reads:

"Lastly, all the rest and residue of my estate of any and every form, kind, and description whatsoever, I hereby giv, devise, and bequeath, under the name of 'the Hutchins fund,' to Henry George, the well-known author of 'Progress and Poverty,' his heirs, executors, and administrators, in sacred trust for the express purpose of 'spreading the light' on social and political liberty and justice in these United States of America by means of the gratuitous, wise, efficient, and economically conducted distribution all over the land of said George's publications on the all-important land question and cognate subjects, including his 'Progress and Poverty,' his replies to the criticisms thereon, his 'Problems of the Times,' and any other of his books and pamphlets which he may think it wise and proper to gratuitously distribute in this country; provided, first, that the said George, his heirs, executors, and administrators, shall regularly furnish true annual reports of the management and disbursement of the said fund to the paper called the Irish World and the American Industrial Liberator, or its acknowledged successor, and shall also annually mail or otherwise send a copy of said paper containing such annual reports to each of the following persons, to wit, my aforementioned wife, Mary Hutchins, now of this place; William Wood, now of Parker, county of Randolph, state of Indiana, and James Hutchins, now of Selma, county of Delaware, and state of Indiana; and provided, second, that said George, his heirs, executors, and administrators, shall cause to be inserted or printed opposit the title-page of every free copy of his books distributed by means of this fund, this, my solemn request, virtually, to wit, that each recipient shall read it and then circulate it among such neighbors or other persons as in his best judgment will make the best use of it."

Chancellor Bird's decision is that "a bequest for the distribution of books in which the author describes the system by which the landowners of the country hold the title to their land, as robbery, is not such a charity as the courts will enforce." In leading up to this conclusion, the arguments of the chancellor take a wide range, and incidentally include some reflections upon Infidelity, though he refrains from deciding that heretical works are as wicked as Mr. George's books. On this point he says: "I am not required to say what the court should do in case of a bequest providing for the circulation of an Infidel or blasphemous or immoral publication. According to the enlightened training of the present age, we cannot believe that such a case will ever arise, although the generous efforts of many, the most God-fearing, do, though unintentionally, encourage the circulation of such books, by their indiscriminate donations establishing public libraries. Whether the courts could undertake the winnowing process is not now material." Mr. George's books, he holds, are not obnoxious to the charge of heresy, for "they are not indifferent on the subject of Christianity, recognizing it throughout." He decides against Mr. George because that gentleman says:

"It is not merely a robbery in the past, it is a robbery in the present - a robbery that deprives of their birthright the infants that are coming into the world. Why should we hesitate about making short work of such a system? Because I was robbed yesterday, and the day before, and the day before that, is it any reason that I should suffer myself to be robbed to-day and to-morrow? any reason that I should conclude that the robber has acquired a vested right to rob me?

"Historically, as ethically, private property in land is robbery."

These sentiments involve "the church and our state, and all the institutions established and regulated thereby," and though Mr. Bird upholds freedom of the press, "unless the book be irreligious or immoral," he cannot allow such revolutionary sentiments to be circulated.

Leaving that part of the matter to be argued out by Mr. George—though it is at once apparent that he has the right to put his argument for public property in land in as forcible language as he can command—we desire to call attention to Chancellor Bird's constant inweaving of Christianity with the state. Besides the instances we hav cited, he reviews the writings of Joanna Southcote, to circulate which a testatrix left a certain residue of her estate, as Mr. Hutchins left his to circulate the books of Mr. George. Chancellor Bird goes on to say: "The heir filed a bill alleging that the gift for such purpose was either void in law on the ground that the writings were of a blasphemous and profane character, or that the trust so declared was for the propagation of doctrins subversiv to the Christian religion. It seems that Joanna Southcote taught in her books that she was with child by the Holy Ghost, and that a second Messiah was about to be born of her body. In speaking of her, Sir John Romilly, master of the rolls, said: 'In the history of her life, her personal disputations and conversations with the devil, her prophecies and her intercommunings with the spiritual world, I hav found much that, in my opinion, is very foolish, but nothing which is likely to make persons who read them either immoral or irreligious,' Again, he says, 'I cannot say that the bequest of a testator to publish and propagate works in support of the Christian religion is a charitable bequest, and at the same time say that if another testator should select for this purpose some three or four authors whose works will in his opinion produce that effect, such a bequest thereupon ceases to be charitable. Neither can I do so if the testator should select one single author.' The bequest was sustained." By implication, at least, the doctrin is here laid down that if the crazy woman's doctrins had been subversiv of Christianity the bequest would hav been void. But as she only imagined she was with child by the same parent who produced Jesus Christ, why, that proved perhaps the existence of the ghost, and so established the truth of the gospel! Therefore the bequest was sustained! The chancellor further comments: "Certainly if the purpose of the testator was to disseminate doctrins immoral in their character, tendency, or influence they could not be called charitable in any sense, nor could they in any sense be said to elevate or improve mankind." In this comment lies the possibility and potency of a very vigorous religious crusade against heretical works There is scarcely a Christian in the country who will not say that Paine's works "disseminate doctrins immoral in their character, tendency, or influence;" and Canadian Christians go so far as to denounce Ingersoll's lectures as obscene! According to Chancellor Bird's theory, therefore, no one has a right to circulate them, or leave money at death for others to use in circulating them. The labor of the God-in-the-Constitution party is certainly superfluous in New Jersey, which already has as nice a union of state and church as the most fastidious Christian can desire.

Mr. George is going to take his case to a higher court. Perhaps the decision of the appellate authority will throw some light upon the union of church and state which Chancellor Bird has established to his own if not to an Infidel's satisfaction.

Scholars of Infidel Color.

Mr. C. F. Hunt, of Mayfair, Ill., sends us this on a postal card:

"On May 26th the Chicago morning News said: 'The world's scholarship, all that is worthy of the name, to-day is Christian, and it is only occasionally that, in any quarter of the civilized globe, a meteor like Ingersoll appears as an Infidel wanderer in the galaxy of genius.'

"A complete list of 'worthy' scholars of Infidel color would surprise the News. Can you giv it? Such a list ought to be compiled, absolutely reliable, ready at hand for Freethinkers."

In the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1884 we gave a list of noted Freethinkers, and among them will be found a great many whose scholarship has been recognized as "worthy" by the whole civilized world. We may here mention a few whose place in history will be readily granted: Roger Bacon, Jeremy Bentham, Lord Bolinbroke, Giordano Bruno, H. T. Buckle, Louis Büchner, Count Buffon, W. K. Clifford, Bishop Colenso, Auguste Comte, Condorcet, Copernicus, D'Alembert, Charles R. Darwin, D'Holbach, Diderot, John W. Draper, George Eliot, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Feuerbach, Fichte, Fourier, Ben. Franklin, Frederick the Great, J. A. Froude, Galileo, Gibbon, Goethe, Horace Greeley, Ernest Haeckel, Sir Wm. Hamilton, Heinrich Heine, Hegel, Helmholtz, Helvetius, Herschel I. and II., Hobbes, Victor Hugo, Alexander von Humboldt, David Hume, Thomas Huxley, Kant, Laplace, Lecky, Leibnitz, G. H. Lewes, Abraham Lincoln, Linnæus, John Locke, Lyell, John Stuart Mill, Max Müller, James Parton, Theodore Parker, Wendell Phillips, Joseph Priestley, R. A. Proctor, J. E. Renan, George Sand, Schelling, Schiller, Schopenhauer, Michael Servetus, Herbert Spencer, Spinoza, Strauss, Professor John Tyndall, Voltaire, E. L. Youmans, and scores of others.

There is being prepared in England a biographical dictionary of Freethinkers, which we think will be a great accession to our statistical literature, but pending its publication the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL is about the most useful work in print. Every issue has special features, and taken together the various years' ANNUALS form a library of generous proportions and great worth. We advise the purchase for reference and edification of all the issues from 1884 to the present, and for 1889 when it appears.

Then and Now.

In selecting the jurymen who were to try Madam Diss Debar for conspiring to obtain money from lawyer Marsh, her lawyer strenuously insisted upon a religious jury. "We contend that everything done by the defendant," he said, "was based upon religion, and we must hav religious men to try her. The Christian religion is the religion of this country, and any man who does not believe both the Old and the New Testament is disqualified to be a juror." To obtain a jury who believed in the superstitions of the Old Testament, he questioned each talesman as to whether he had read that book, and whether he believed in the Witch of Endor yarn as related in 1 Samuel. He put also a variety of theological questions, and was evidently surprised to find so many jurymen who had not read the Bible, did not know anything about the Witch of Endor, and would try Madam Diss Debar for her actions and not for her religion. His persistent efforts drew a ruling from Judge Gildersleeve that he would not exclude men from the jury because they did not believe in the divinity of Christ. The lawyer took an exception, "because, from beginning to end, the trial would hinge altogether upon religion and religious belief."

The intended defense of the lawyer was apparent. He thought if he could get a jury who believed that the woman at Endor, who had a familiar spirit, conjured up Samuel's ghost to advise Saul, he could get them to believe that Madam Diss Debar had also a familiar spirit who could paint pictures at sight, or obtain the assistance of the spirits of Raphael and Rembrandt to paint them. But, as one juryman put it after the witch story had been explained to him, though he might believe the ancient tale he should not the modern one, and thus was illustrated the difficulty the Lord would hav in getting his revelation accepted should he desire to add to Holy Writ. The conduct of the lawyer strengthened neither the popular faith in the Bible nor the defense of the alleged Modern Witch of Endor. In court, the ancient tales of superstition find little credence.

All of which goes to show the wide difference between the present and "about 1056 before Christ."

Less Intelligent than a New York Juryman.

While the Witch of Endor story is contemptuously rejected by New York jurymen, even of Hebrew extraction, it seems that our Peruvian neighbors, if a dispatch to the World is reliable, are lingering along contemporary with John Knox, Cotton Mather, or some other believers in witchcraft. The dispatch referred to states that in Pataz, Peru, a woman has been publicly burnt alive for practicing alleged supernatural powers. No particulars are given, and this vague announcement is the total libel on the South American republic. We trust for humanity's sake that it is not true.

But Peru has been a Catholic country since Pizarro ravished it in the name of religion, and reduced its twenty or thirty millions of nativs to a beggarly two or three millions of superstitious thieves and slaves. There is nothing improbable in the dreadful story of witch-burning, for Catholics hav ere now done the same in other countries, and probably would now in any country where they had supreme control, unchecked by surrounding nations. Were it not for France and Italy, Spain might easily reëstablish her Inquisition, and Leo XIII. could follow the example of Leo X. and his predecessors and successors, and issue bulls against witchcraft. The "Witch Hammer" might again become a guide to judges, and the horrors of witch-hunting be reënacted. In the bishopric of Bamberg, the church averaged for a period of four years one hundred and fifty burnings annually. In the bishopric of Würzburg, two hundred and twenty-five were the yearly sacrifices to brutal ignorance. In Calvin's city one hundred and twenty-five a month were burnt for four months of 1516, and seven years later, in Como, a thousand or more were tortured within the period of a twelvemonth. Thousands more were slain in other places, and the Christian religion was responsible. We hav the same religion to-day, though the people are different, and perhaps in Peru, uncivilized and ignorantly religious, the tragedy telegraphed so briefly may hav occurred. It is a saddening thought, filling us with indignation for the religion, and pity for the victim and the degraded priests who instigated the horror.

Editorial Notes.

MR. JEROME DUTTON, of Wheatland, Ia., informs us that while attending the district court in Nevada, as a witness, he was asked if he believed in a God, but upon objection from counsel the judge ruled the question out. It would hav gratified us to write that judge's name large if Mr. Dutton had forwarded it. Honest officials like him should be encouraged.

THE Rev. James M. Buckley was reëlected by the General Conference to the editorship of the Christian Advocate. In his paper of June 7th, he therefore proceeds to congratulate himself and the church upon the event, and to outline the duties of his position. He says:

"Absolute impartiality is the duty of its conductor; neither his prejudices nor preposessions should be allowed to determin what should be rejected or admitted, or whose contributions should find a place among the multitude offered. The same general principles of selection must be applied to all."

We regret to note that nowhere does he indicate that one of the duties of the editor is to condemn dishonest voting and ballot-box-stuffing, wire-pulling for bishoprics, and lobbying for favorits. The sympathy and pravers of his subscribers, which he asks for, ought to be turned in this direction. It certainly cannot injure the church to hav her supporters honest.

BY its low abuse as well as by the direct admission that "those who enter the lists with him can hardly expect to get the better of him," the Independent of this city, a Congregational journal of wide repute, acknowledges that Colonel Ingersoll has overwhelmed Mr. Gladstone in the memorable controversy now being discussed throughout the country. The abuse of the Independent would not be worthy of notice were it not that it is a good sample of the manner in which the discussion between Mr. Gladstone and Colonel Ingersoll is treated by the religious press generally. The editors know, for the great secular press has told them, that Christianity has been worsted, though defended by its layman greatest in controversy, and they feel that there is left to them but the last resort of a defeated attorney. In such abuse they are the competent of the competent, and are doing full justice to their reputations. They would not dare to repeat their editorials before one of Colonel Ingersoll's friends, but this is a slight matter to theologians who hav long since ceased to be gentlemen.

"PLAIN BILL ALLRED, Samson of the Church of Jesus Christ," Montgomery, Ala., challenges the churches of that city, which he savs are full of idolatry, witchcraft, sorcery, and blasphemy, in the language of scripture: "Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick; and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he hav committed sins, they shall be forgiven him." Mr. Allred offers, if his challenge is accepted and the churches can show to him "and to all the people as did Elijah to the prophets of Baal, and to all the people, that God will hear your prayers and heal the sick, then I will cease my chiding and my warfare on your lying vanities, for you will then hav established the truth of your assertions satisfactorily to my mind according to the scriptural test." But if this test is not accomplished and the Lord does not hear the prayers of the churches and heal the sick, then, Mr. Allred says to them, "your lying vanities must go—such as organs, horns, and musical instruments of all kinds, with your rented pews, carpeted floors, velvet-covered altars and seats, fine and costly chandeliers for gas or electricity—and you must become a plain people and a plain church, so that the poorest and the humblest of all people, regardless of nationality, color, or sex, can be on an equal footing in the church of Jesus Christ." The churches are offered their choice, either to unite and make the effort all together, or they may try it single-handed. And if they do not feel that they can stand the touchstone of scripture, they are to consider themselvs "mocked in their idolatry, as were the prophets of Baal by Elijah." We fear Mr. Allred is a very unpractical sort of a practical Christian.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. BELL lectured in Delevan, Minn., June 9th, 10th, 11th; and in Huron, Dak., on the 14th, 15th, and 16th, and also in Jamestown, Dak., on the same dates.

MR. J. K. INGALLS, author of "Social Wealth," has inaugurated a lectureship on the New Industrial Economy, at his home in Glenora, N. Y. His subjects are: The Ethics and Economics of the Labor and Capital Problem, Normal Ownership of the Land, Money and Credit, Competition and Cooperation. The lectures upon these subjects will be furnished to students as fast as prepared. The terms for the course are $10; singly, $1. Students who can giv personal attendance will hav the benefit of oral illustration and explanation, as well as copies of the lectures. Such can obtain, at moderate charge, board and comfortable rooms at Mr. Ingalls's home, on one of the most healthy and picturesque spots on Seneca Lake. Mr. Ingalls is a cultured and gentle scholar, and his thoughts upon the subjects mentioned are well worth studying. As a practical land reformer he antedates Henry George by many years.

A Very Peculiar Church.

From the Sun.

The Rev. H. F. Titus, former pastor of the Baptist church at Newton, Mass., has concluded to try and start a new church whose members shall undertake to liv as Jesus Christ lived. He thinks that in the ideal church, such as he proposes to found, there should be no rich, no poor; that the members should giv generously one to another; that they should take care of each other better than Freemasons or any other similar society, and that there should be no social distinctions among them.

Letters from Friends.

OSCEOLA, IA., May 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Let the grand truths which you promulgate ever disseminate knowledge throughout Christendom, and eradicate the superstition that "beyond the realms of time and space we await that heavenly place." Yours for liberty of thought and speech, FRANK I. JONES.

DAYTON, WASH., May 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from the beginning, and know all about the trials and troubles of its founder, and did a little to help him, and would hav done more if I could. Of course, I like THE TRUTH SEEKER, or I should not take it so long. Yes, it suits theologically and almost every other way. And long liv Heston—his pictures are immense! Respectfully yours, SALEM FOUTS.

PARKERSBURG, ORE., May 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Without THE TRUTH SEEKER I should be lost, in a literary sense, for I think it the grandest educator for a Liberal-minded man. We are expecting S. P. Putnam among us next month to deliver a series of lectures. Mr. Putnam was among us last June, and greatly appreciated by all. Putnam s a trump, and makes old orthodoxy tremble.

Fraternally your friend, D. JOHN LOWE.

NEWARK, N. Y., May 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: J. E. Remsburg has been here and delivered three lectures, as announced, and nothing very serious has happened here yet, except, as the old saying is, the wounded bird flutters. There is some fluttering among the professors of religion, but we hope to hav Mr. Remsburg or some other good lecturer here again in the near future to giv them another truth or two to bluster about.

WM. H. H. STEBBINS.

LEADVILLE, COL., May 18, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Since I hav been here I hav tried to get subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I hope I hav succeeded. I hav noticed men here in the hotel pick up THE TRUTH SEEKER from the table, look at it, then throw it down and walk off, come back, pick it up, and commence to read; very soon there will be a smile light up their whole countenance, and they will say, "Well, well, I thought this was a religious paper," and then read it right through. I think the cartoon in the paper of May 5th immense. Good luck to THE TRUTH SEEKER. ARTHUR VENN.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., June 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: What of one George A. Sheridan, itinerant lecturer and Bible boomer? Is he "Brother-to-Bassett"—I mean Brother Phil, the illustrious—or cousin, or uncle, or what? Or is he merely one of Jahveh's heelers, minus illustrious relativs, and known to a few as George A. Sheridan? Don't tell me he is one of those whom not to know argues one's self unknown, as that puts me in a hole and drives the hole in upon me. Whatever the antecedents or whoever the relativs of this G. A. S. bag, he seems to be trying to draw attention to his diminutivness by bucking at Ingersoll, as do other insects at the electric light. Robert G. Ingersoll and George A. Sheridan! Lion and polecat, with G. A. S. in the role of polecat, and entirely successful. The poor little specimen acts like one who thinks God can't take care of his own libel suits, so takes a hand in to help him out! That's all I hav to say of this little G. A. S. leak at present. I giv my name, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith, you know. SI SLOKUM.

PINE RIVER, COL., June 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Having been a subscriber to your paper for the last year, and not seeing any letter from this corner, I venture to let you know how the work is progressing here. Up to this time there hav been but two subscribers in this locality to your paper, but by looking around a little I am able to send you $11, for which you will send five copies, and a copy of "The Nine Demands," as published by Mr. Charles Eckhard. Most of the people are Liberals, but they don't know it. What they need is to hire some good Liberal speaker. Why don't more lecturers come out? The field is large and the laborers are few.

I want Ingersoll for president of the United States and Robert Lincoln for vice-president. And I think that everyone who is a Liberal should speak his sentiments on this subject.

What few Liberals there are here are going to organize a Liberal club here, and I think all other Liberals should do the same. I notice the church is never idle. I had a good old deacon tell me the other day when I told him that I was a believer in Ingersoll's doctrin: "Keep right on, keep right on, and you will go down with him to the bottomless pit!" I felt bad for the poor old man, but I couldn't help him; he was dyed in the wool. CLARENCE HENSLEY.

SO. LOWELL, ALA., June 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In the Messiah Herald of May 23d is an article entitled. "Lockhart on Ingersoll." Rev. B. W. Lockhart, of Suffield, writes to the Hartford Times on: "First, Mr. Ingersoll's contradictory statements about God. 'I do not say that a God does not exist; but I say I do not know' (North American Review, 1888. p 483). Mr. Ingersoll says he is an Agnostic. He does not know whether there is a God or not. Now mark: 'I beg of you [i. e., Field] to take the first sober thought, and you will be satisfied that the supernatural does not exist' (p. 505)." Then Mr. Lockhart goes on with his remarks, and closes with: "But about the plain, bold fact of the existence of God, to say almost in the same breath: God may exist—God cannot exist; I don't know—I do know! Shame on the trifler in the house of the Lord!"

Now I want to ask Mr. Lockhart some questions. Is God natural or not natural? Jesus says, "If a man hath seen me, he hath seen the father." Was Jesus natural or not? If Mr. Ingersoll is honest in his statements, has he a right to speak them? When did Mr. Ingersoll get into the house of the Lord? Do you believe in the supernatural? If you do believe, do you know of the supernatural? If you do, please giv us the proof of the same. I think it will be hard work to make any scientific mind believe in the supernatural. The best definition of God I remember is by Pope:

Whose body nature is,
And God the soul.

Mr. Ingersoll is not going to kick everyone who fails to understand him. J. K. DEARTH.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been trying to get a few subscribers. I hav had the promis of two or three. but they liv quite a way from here and I do not get to see them often. However, I think maybe I will get them this summer. I want to send at least one new name. I think every subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER ought to try to do that; and just think how it would help the grand old standard of truth circulate through our land. It would double the subscription list. Just think of what a big thing it would be. It would enable the Truth Seeker Company to pay Mr. Heston more for the noble work he is doing; it would make as many again readers of the best paper in the world, and, above all, it would be such a grand help to a noble cause. Now, brothers and sisters, I will pledge myself to send in at least one new subscriber inside of three months; how many will do this? Let us hear from one and all. I will begin by sending a list of names of those that I think will like the paper, and inside of three months and at as early a date as possible I will renew and send in my new subscriber. I do not want to miss a single copy. The pictures are too good, to say nothing of the ten or twelve pages of good reading each week. Now, friends, let us see if we can't boom THE TRUTH SEEKER in the next three months. Let each one send in a new subscriber's name, with the cash, and that will be one of the grandest booms the good old soldier has ever had. I mean a subscriber for a year, and no less time. Hoping that this little plan will be a success in the case of every subscriber, I am, Yours for truth and justice, S. P. WOOD.

SNOWVILLE, VA., May 31, 288.

MR. EDITOR: I want to thank all the good, kind hearts who hav responded to my appeal for dimes for the defense of Walker and Harman. I hav personally received for them 146 donations; the latest of which comes from an old and true friend of mine, Thomas Goddard, who bears my father's given name, and, I think, must hav a large share of his kind and generous nature, for whenever help is needed for Radical work, there you see a donation from him.

I hav the names of all who hav sent me help for Hacker, Casey, Harman and Walker, and for my own contest with the Comstock crew, recorded in a book; and I often run them over as a Catholic would his list of saints—only mine are real benefactors, who deserve more credit than the majority of the saints ever earned.

I am proud of every good deed done by us Liberals, and I hope they will increase and multiply till the name itself will mean all that is good, true, and lovely.

I presume you all know Harman and Walker are reindicted, and that your dimes are needed just as much now as ever. I shall be glad of every one that comes, and each donor will receive a copy of the two papers Lucifer and Fair Play, and a letter of thanks from Elmina. There! isn't that a temptation for you to send a few stamps for the defense fund? I might offer a chromo, only they are so common. Perhaps a leaf of ribbon grass, as a souvenir from Snowville, will be an inducement?

Let us do what we can to falsify Pope's:

Tru hs would you teach, or save a sinking land?
All fear, none aid you, and few understand.
Painful preeminence! y urself to view
Above life's weakness, and its comforts, too—

by showing true, helpful sympathy with the oppressed and persecuted teachers of a Radical philosophy entirely consonant with the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States.

All thoughts of ill; all evil deeds,
That hav their root in thoughts of ill;
Whatever hinders or impedes
The action of the nobler will—

All these must first be trampled down
Beneath our feet, if we would gain
In the brig t fields of fair renown
The right of eminent domain.

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., May 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: O. S. Barrett thinks I might profit by reading the Freethinkers' Magazine. Well, I do read it. The editor keeps sending it to me, though I hav several times told him not to, and the postman puts it into my private box, so I suppose a bill will follow in due season. I am happy to agree with Mr. Barrett that it presents much to benefit me. I read the article on Mrs. Slenker at the time of her arrest with a deal of pleasure, also several in the same spirit about the persecution of the Replogles at the much misnamed town of Liberal, and others equally creditable to the editor's capacity for Freethinking. Mr. Barrett says a man, if he be "loil," need look no farther than his own convictions to see the fallacy of Anarchy. Of course not; the "trooly loil" evolves the whole thing—Anarchy and its refutation—from the depths of his moral consciousness, which saves a heap of trouble reading up about it. Those who are not so loyal hav to undergo the labor of studying a system before they form an opinion on its merits. No one who has read Mr. Barrett's former letter will doubt his loyalty at all. Mr. Barrett repeats that there are millions of fertil acres open to homestead entry, but omits again to state where they are. He says a man of ordinary caliber who says the Chicago martyrs did not get their just deserts favors their principles. Now, so far as I am concerned, that is all right. I do favor the same principles right from the word Go. But of Trumbull, Butler, Ingersoll, and McAllister, I hardly think it. Mr. Barrett denies it, and again I am happy to agree with him. But what did they say and do in the premises? Judge McAllister said the man who threw the bomb in the Haymarket was justified in doing so. So say I. Yet it seems to me a man might think even an Anarchist justified in defending his life without being an Anarchist. Much more, without being an Anarchist, he might think that one Anarchist ought not to be hanged because another Anarchist killed somebody, even without justification. Trumbull has published two books to prove the Chicago martyrdom what posterity will undoubtedly consider it—a foul judicial murder. Butler has compared it to the hanging of witches in New England. Ingersoll accepted the defense of the Anarchists before the Supreme Court. Mr. Barrett has contradicted himself somewhere. Either a man of their caliber can deny that the martyrs suffered justly without favoring their principles, or else McAllister, Ingersoll, Butler, and Trumbull do favor Anarchy.

Mr. Barrett says he did not get his disability in trying to appropriate his neighbor's belongings. Well, let us see. If he got it in the war, it was in what our "wayward sisters" used to call "nigger-stealing;" and less than two years before the war the "trooly loil" were all in favor of hanging men for that, as I distinctly remember, though I am probably a younger man than Barrett. C. L. JAMES.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME, O., May 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: My attention has just been called to an editorial article in the Dayton, O., Democrat of the 23d inst.—a paper, as I understand, conducted and controled by Catholics—which is worthy of reproduction as showing "how the wind blows" among advanced thinkers belonging to that branch of the Christian church. It is in reference to evolution as expounded by Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, et al, and it being unique I quote it in full:

A decided revival of common sense in theological circles is noted by the publication of very liberal and broad-visioned articles in church journals. The Guardian, of London, organ of the Episcopacy, publishes a series of articles on Darwinism and the Christian faith the object of which is to frankly yield the untenable ground of controversy; and it does it with a courage that is admirable. There is no longer a question but that evolutiou has been accepted by nearly the whole world of scholars, and to it theology must adapt itself, precisely as it was compelled to readjust itself to the heliocentric conception of the universe. It only needs a reign of common sense and religious pluck. The truth will stand; only error dies, or can die.

The whole ground heretofore supposed to be in dispute is yielded to the evolutionists. If I understand the force of words, the church must now align itself with those scientists who hav forced the acceptance of evolution on the intellectual world.

But, if interrogatories were in order, is the somersault greater than from a plane to a spherical earth theory? And has not the church all of the characteristics of the chameleon? It so appears to me. Is not this a modern adaptation of the old idea of "appearing all things to all men"—Jesuitism attempting to "corral" modern thought?

Mark the prediction, that within fifty years the church will claim evolution as a child of its own; that it (the church) has been insisting on the acceptance of that doctrin since the time of Constantine, at least; and the then Christian exponents of this doctrin will attempt to manipulate the "divine word," so called, so as to prove that evolution is clearly taught therein! They are sure to do it.

And then the masses—is there any hope for them? Bless our hearts, very few of us hav caught on to the weakness, the subserviency, of people who worship puppets. Does a little girl want a doll? Men and women are children of older growth, hence it is certain that so long as they are trammeled with the shackles of superstition each and every one, male and female, will require his or her puppet.

Were it not that with a kind of prophetic eye I see "hope for humanity" inscribed on the banners of the future, I should drop by the wayside in utter weariness, whispering with my last breath, Humanity is doomed, lost, lost, lost!

Very truly yours, WM. H. MCRAE.

HOWARD, N. Y., May 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Hav justice and charity no abiding-place in the hearts as well as heads of the people of the latter part of this the nineteenth century, since the advent of Christianity, so called? But to me the name Christianity is a misnomer, else distinguished representativs of it, Talmage for example, would not stand up in their pulpits and rant against those who believe that "death does not end all by considerable," the same as they do. In harmony with biblical teachings, "charity covereth a multitude of sins; envieth not; is not puffed up, does not behave itself unseemly, thinketh no evil," etc. What are the teachings of "the holy Bible," so called, good for, unless made practical by those who claim to revere them? Are theory and practice never to unite, and, like twin sisters, travel along together, that those who set themselvs up as teachers may appear, and be, consistent teachers, by uniting practice with theory in their daily lives?

And the inconsistencies of teachers are not confined to biblical elucidators, but eveu many calling themselvs Liberals or Materialists seem to forget that Spiritualists hav rights, and that their peculiar ideas are entitled to respectful consideration as well as their own. I was deeply pained to see C. B. Reynolds giv utterance to such uncharitable insinuations as he did in THE TRUTH SEEKER not many weeks back, when, to my certain knowledge, no class of minds felt a deeper interest in his getting free from the clutches of the law, as administered in the courts of New Jersey, than many intelligent Spiritualists. Brother Reynolds, allow me to say to you, in this public way, that "truth knows no favorits, bows to no individual shrine, neither can it be mocked or set aside with impunity." So, would you be worthy of the sympathy of intelligent Spiritualists, do not lend your pen to such uncharitable as well as unjust ranting about a subject that, it is made very clear, you are none too familiar with, and therefore not well qualified to do justice to. You believe, as well as myself, that the great family of man is a unit; then why not try to keep them more in harmony with the principle of justice and charity by setting a worthy example?

I once heard you speak when your theme was D. M. Bennett, and my soul was thrilled again and again with your just and charitable utterances in reference to his life and character as a man. The man spoke then, and not the ranter.

If the Liberal elements in society cannot stop fighting each other, how can they ever expect to successfully cope with the il-Liberal elements, who are doing their level best to try and silence the voice of truth, justice, and charity, unless made manifest in their peculiar way? O Liberals, of whatever name, do let us try to forget our individual selvs, and work for humanity while we can!

Belief is not what makes the man or woman, but "lives tell," and "living the truth is the redemption of man"—not merely living it in theory, but living it everywhere and in every way. MRS. JULIA C. FRANKLIN.

MOUNT PLEASANT, UTAH, May 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I will giv the free wool men and others an idea of sheep-raising in the West. A great many hav written about it without perhaps one day of actual experience. In the fall, about the 1st of November, when snow commences to come, we leave our summer ranges in the mountains and rush pell-mell down, and if we did not we would lose every sheep. Some one may ask, Why don't you drive down before it snows? but we cannot do that on account of scarcity of water, and where water does happen to be found there is no feed. So snow is our dependence, which we hav to melt, both for our horses and ourselvs, and so we hav to feed and travel on to what we call desert, and are almost wholly guided by the snow. From two to six inches of snow are about right for us. Every snowstorm that starts to come, we hav to rush farther out again for fear of getting snowed up, as all then would be lost, and so on it goes until we get on the lowest altitude, and there we hav to combat with what comes.

Now, sometimes a small rain happens to come and our snow is gone; this is the worst of all, and we hav to turn back in mud and mire, which is awful on those alkali flats. And so on, forward and back, all winter. While all this is going on we are subject to frost, and cold all the way from zero to 40° below, and all the accommodation we hav is a covered wagon wherein we hav all our provisions, cooking utensils, grain for our horses, saddles and pack-saddles, and finally our bed on top of all this. Whenever a coyote, a wildcat, a wolf, or some other vermin, or a snowstorm, comes upon us in the night, then away run our sheep, and we must now out of bed in a hurry, cold perhaps 40° below zero and dark as can be, and out after the sheep; and so it goes, sometimes twenty times one single night. When morning comes after such a storm, perhaps our horses hav gone with the storm, and we must out after them the first thing. Perhaps we find them that day and perhaps not for two or three days, and after we do find them we are bound to turn them loose again to feed on the scanty brush and grasses there, as they cannot liv on grain alone, and hay is out of the question. But now we are getting out of horse-feed, provisions, or something else, and the one man now has to put the pack-saddles on the horses and go perhaps seventy-five miles or more to the nearest point to get supplies. And there he also writes a letter home and tells them how things are moving, how many sheep he has lost, and so on. Among other things, he tells his family not to write to him until they hear from him again, as he doesn't know where he will be. But now by and by five months hav gone and the 1st of April appears, and the snow has gone, except what little may be found in some ravine or gulch on the north side of some hill. Perhaps the last month he has had to carry snow in sacks five or six miles both for himself and his horses to drink, but now he must follow up the snow going back—a hard thing to do. The sheep are weak and poor, and the snow disappears too fast for him, and those alkali flats become in some places the worst mire one ever saw, and if the sheep get to drink of the pools of water gathered in those places they will die. So he has to travel almost night and day to keep up with the snow; herds ahead, herds behind him, and herds alongside of him, and if he gets mixed with any of them then I tell you there is something to do to get parted again; until he gets back to the foot of the big mountains about the 1st of May, where he finds water.

He now lambs his herd, and after that he shears them and gets from three to six pounds per head, all the wool left on the sheep after they hav been running through brush and bad stuff all winter and spring and torn a big portion of it off. Then he counts his sheep and lambs, and sees how many more lambs he has raised than died during the winter. After that he goes into the mountain and has a good time for about four or five months, and during all that time it takes two men and sometimes three men to one herd of about two thousand head, besides also three head of horses to feed the year around; wagons, saddles, cooking utensils, to keep up, and our herders to be paid from $25 to $40 and board per month; and besides all that we hav to dip our sheep once or twice every summer to keep them clean from scab, and no small expense that is. Now, I don't mean to say this explanation answers every particular case, but it answers the business in general here.

Now, I hav not started in to discussing the tariff question; I am not able to do this, but I wish to exp'ain by actual experience that wool cannot be raised in the West much cheaper, and will also say if the tariff is taken off wool the cheap mutton the people will get will soon turn into no mutton at all. And besides that, it will ruin perhaps thousands of men there who hav now through a lifetime accumulated a little for old age by following such a life. And not that alone; a great many poor families are depending on the wages their sons and husbands are getting for herding. And if any one of the free wool men wants to change his occupation and come West and go into the sheep business, let him come out here, especially if the tariff is taken off. Let him come quickly; he will not hav to wait long to get a load on.

NEILS P. NEILSON.

LEXINGTON, KY., May 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I offer a few isolated reflections.

How nations are coming to the light, one after the other, throwing off the nightmare imposed on them by the "iron machine!" How the nativ good sense of the Irish people is asserting itself! Years ago they were leaders in literary matters. I think there will be no more showers of Peter's pence. She must see glorious days, the land that produced Robert Emmett. The pope feels his power declining. How convulsivly he grasps at straws! When he is brought to this country, that will be the last act in his drama of folly. Such is the fate of every man who outrages nature and common sense. When the "oracles are dumb," and man "givs his brother leave to toil," and he finds that he is trampled down no more, how even the most distant isles will break forth into laughter and singing!

Let the monopolist wind up his conscience for the last time. The plan which works for the general good will hav no screws loose. The corruption, the decomposition, of evil will now soon grow more intense—oh, who can "minister to a mind diseased?"—poisoned members will drop away; finally good will flourish. Leo sees "Birnam wood coming to Dunsinane." The Fates, bearing the black banner of defeat, are whispering in husky tones, "Count not upon the order of your going, but go at once!" The selfish capitalist, who cares not for his brother's good, will shriek, "Oh, where shall I fly for safety?" Bloody Bibles and prophecies, with the epistles of Peter describing the future conflagration of the world—already pronounced spurious by Eusebius—these shalt burn, by the fierce and deadly flame of their own impurity.

How can it be otherwise? Ages of wrong hav left seated in the human heart a deadly hatred of tyranny. Every obstacle feeds the flame. The new could be grafted upon the old if the selfish few would permit. When all is ready, the granit rocks of evil will rise with a bound, for nothing can resist the secret, subtle force of truth. The ground is heaving; soon all will be over. Once there was but one Jefferson; it is not so now.

Every cranny of the human heart has been searched by priests and politicians, every weakness has been fed, and while the multitude hav humbly knelt, the dark betrayer has fared sumptuously every day.

The foolish fable of the Holy Ghost (we had a dose of it last night) is the deadly leech which has clung to the human mind through years, becoming more shamefully unreasonable every day, until it has assumed the hideous, dragon-like form of orthodoxy, in connection with other absurd doctrins discountenanced by reason.

We were lately favored with a lecture by Mrs. Lucy Stone on woman's rights. She is a charming lady and a good speaker. "Let your women keep silence in the churches," seems to be a stumbling-block in women's way. Will you follow Paul's example, and lay your children at the feet of some corrupt and cruel tyrant, to see their minds distorted, their manhood crushed, their pure and holy thoughts made light of, or will you not rather teach them to raise calmly the brow of defiant courage, determined to resist to the last all attempts which are made to enslave the human race? Their bodies may seem free; will you suffer their minds to be the degraded tools of a greedy and sensual enemy of all that is noble and of good report?

I see the Prohibitionists are publishing their platform minus the most important plank—the one to place the country under a religious power, to which the Spanish Inquisition would be as nothing. I only hope that those who understand their designs will watch them carefully at the present time.

ALHAZA.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, May 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The question is asked why the Secular Union does not receive a hearty support from the great body of Liberals of every shade of opinion. The above question is asked in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 26th, page 334, column four, headed, "Whisperers." Please allow me space to answer. I reside in Salt Lake City, and I know there is no better field for Freethought lecturers and auxiliaries than Utah offers in America. About two years ago Samuel Putnam organized what was called the Secular Union, and filled about two columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER with gush about what had been done for Utah, then left for other fields. He returned in about a year after and found the Secular Union as he left it, without one member added to the list, and not one single meeting had been held by the officers in charge. He gave us three "nice" lectures—that is, he did not hurt anyone or awaken any dead. He sold some literature, and pocketed $50. The same organization—nothing done—no advancement made. Now comes Dr. J. L. York. He givs, per agreement, fourteen lectures, filling the Opera House every Sunday night, and on many occasions hundreds not finding room to stand. I tell you, it was grand to hear the old doctor rattle up the dry bones of orthodoxy. He made the sky-pilots squeal. And allow me to say just here that every preacher or priest knows he is a fraud, and to keep his place he labors hard to prevent his dupes from finding it out, or knowing what he knows himself. The doctor showed them all up without fear or favor—all sects, creeds, and denominations alike—and here is where the shoe pinches. The officers of the Secular Union—I mean Samuel Putnam's pets—call a special Star Chamber meeting, then invite Dr. J. L. York to attend. The doctor goes, and to his surprise he is informed that he must stop speaking the truth: "We know you are doing a great work, but you see, we hav a living to make, and you are too radical, too red-hot, for us. We want a goody-goody man that will say the Methodists are doing a good work, the Baptists, Catholics, Congregationalists, and blue Presbyterians. We want to be all together, then we can hav a fricasseed Mormon to gladden the nostrils of Jehovah." Now, who are the petitioners for this kind of thing? The officers of the Secular Union. And who are they? I answer, the president, a defunct seer, prophet, and revelator, who had four wives before the law declared otherwise; vice-president and other officers in the same category, and all now Spiritualists. Now, if this part of the proceedings had been the end of the insult to Dr. York, I should not hav said one word, but a petition was signed by the Secular Union, with two or three exceptions, Messrs. Howard and Wiscomb, and circulated among orthodox churchmen to sign. If this had been all, the thing might stop right there. But no; when the Secular Union officers and churchmen found out that Dr. York could not be moved from the straight path of manhood and honor, they, the Secular Union, gave up the Opera House previous to the last lecture, took away the piano, and discharged Dr. York's solo lady singer, without acquainting Dr. York, who paid for her services out of his own pocket. But the friends of Dr. York came to the rescue, paid the rent, put back the piano, got up a fine social, presented Dr. York with a nice gold-headed cane, and a floral gift, the emblem of truth, with eight hundred friends to say goodspeed to Freethought, independent of the petrified fossils at the head of the Utah Secular Union.

Inclosed you will find a copy of the original petition. A star affixed to a name signifies the person to be a member of the Secular Union; those without stars belong to the orthodox churches. This I would like published for the benefit of any honest Infidel that might wish to come this way, as a warning; but if such a man should come with sand enough in him to deal out the right kind of material that will make them all alike without fear or favor, such a man can clear $50 per week. The friends of Dr. York and the Liberals here do not want a goody-goody man. W. WELLOCK.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, March 10, 1888.

To Dr. J. L. York: We, the undersigned Liberals of Salt Lake, feeling that a more conservativ course than the one adopted by you would result in greater good, therefore ask you to giv the subject your most serious consideration. Facial contortions, nasal twang, mimicry, and ungraceful gyrations of the body are not the best methods of convincing intelligent and thinking people. On the contrary, the tendency is to keep the above class away, and the yap and the small boys are taking their place, as was plainly demonstrated at your last lecture. We know that it is not necessary for the Liberal element to hav recourse to wholesale abuse. The facts are in our favor, and we recognize in you the ability to present them in the most logical and pleasing manner, without resorting to such crudities. Mormon theocracy, as well as kindred fallacies, can be quite as successfully combated by using argument in lieu of abuse. We hav heard you express delight at having been born in a free country and in the full blaze of the nineteenth century, when people are guided by reason and intelligence; why, then, would it not be better to use reason and argument solely, when addressing intelligent people? A little polished levity interspersed throughout a lecture has a tendency to keep your hearers in a good humor and is in good taste and beneficial, but any course adopted that insults the intelligence of the better portion of your audience is in decidedly bad taste. You sometimes seem to lose sight of the fact that the thinking portion of your audience, those most likely to be won over to our cause, are in the transition period of religious thought. Ridicule and sarcasm, as you know, hava tendency to engender bitter feelings, and rivet those whom we would benefit more firmly to their creeds. You can no doubt recall a period in your experience when you were earnestly seeking the truth, when such assaults upon your belief would hav resulted in fixing you more firmly in the old faith, and hav caused you to denounce the one who had insulted your intelligence. The Liberals of this city are agreed that your coming here was most opportune and that the Liberal cause has been advanced, but a feeling of sorrow is being manifested because many of our most influential Liberals are being kept away by this objectionable and extravagant abuse of the various religious elements of our city.

The character of your audience is rapidly changing, and unless a radical change is made in your style the hoodlum element will soon predominate. The frivolous manner in which you sometimes refer to the religious world is fast engendering a feeling of contempt for our cause which will be very difficult to overcome. Already the Salt Lake Tribune, the only paper in Utah to which Liberals can look for help and sympathy, is taking advantage of the character of your audiences, and your mannerisms also, much to the injury of the cause for which we are all working. We cannot afford to furnish the Tribune weapons with which to assail Secularism. We are in a small way furnishing the "sinews of war," and insist that we hav a right to be heard. With no unkindly feeling, and recognizing fully your special utilities to our great cause, but feeling nevertheless the absolute necessity of conformity with the line of policy indicated above, we are, Yours sincerely,

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Love Me Now.

If you're ever going to love me,
Love me now, while I can know
All the sweet and tender feelings
Which from real affection flow.
Love me now while I am living,
Do not wait till I am gone,
And then chisel it in marble—
Warm love-words on ice-cold stone.

If you've dear, sweet thoughts about me,
Why not whisper them to me?
Don't you know 'twould make me happy,
And as glad as glad can be?
If you wait till I am sleeping,
Ne'er to waken here again,
There'll be walls of earth between us,
And I couldn't hear you then.

If you knew some one was thirsting
For a drop of water sweet,
Would you be so slow to bring it?
Would you step with laggard feet?
There are tender hearts all round us
Who are thirsting for our love;
Shall we begrudge to them what heaven
Has kindly sent us from above?

I won't need your kind caresses
When the grass grows o'er my face;
I won't crave your love or kisses
In my last, low resting-place.
So, if you do love me any,
If it's but a little bit,
I'd rather know it now, while I
Can, living, own and treasure it.

The Cosmian Sunday-School.

I want to tell you about this school, because it is not like other schools that hold their one session on Sunday.

There has been for a number of years an Independent Society in Florence, Mass., called the Cosmian. This word is derived from the Greek cosmos, and means order, harmony, unity, truth, combined within the universe. So this Cosmian Society started out on the best of foundations, backed by good and noble men and the same kind of women.

Florence is a very lovely spot, just out of the town of Northampton, where old Jonathan Edwards used to preach about a hell that was paved with the skulls of little children! In contrasting nature with such preaching, the la e J. G. Holland said:

Nature with a thousand tongues
Tender and true, from vale and mountain top,
And smiling streams, and landscapes piled afar,
Proclaims a gentler gospel.

But old Mr. Edwards stopped preaching one day and died, and, since his time, the Cosmian Society sprang into being, built a handsome edifice of brick, grew and flourished. And the Cosmian Sunday-school is an outcome of it.

Rational teaching prevails in the various classes, of which there is one pursuing the study of Shakspere, another in political economy, one in history, botany, I think, and, if I am not mistaken, there is a class in German. The various sciences are studied, and music lends her bright, inspiring charms, the cheerful, soulful strains that lift and ennoble. Each Sunday some new topic, outside of the general classes, is discussed, such as character, truth, energy, patience, etc. The Sunday that I was present, nobility was the theme under consideration. Selections were read, and recitations given by several members of the school bearing upon the subject.

I cannot now giv all the details of the management of the school, but will just say it is a finely conducted progressiv Sunday-school, the best and the freest from superstition it has ever been my lot to visit. The children are bright and wide-awake, quick to see and understand the truth as it is presented to them by able and efficient teachers. The school is under the able management of Mrs. Cary, a graduate of Smith College, and Mr. Hill, the mayor of Northampton, is among the loved and honored teachers.

Speaking of Smith College, located in Northampton, and of which you hav all heard, perhaps, it is a noble institution devoted entirely to the education of girls and young women. A large sum of money was left to found it by Miss Mary Smith. It seems she and one brother had wealth left them. They lived together, but the brother was an inveterate hater of women. He did not like them at all, and loved none of them except his sister. They made their wills, leaving their great property each to the other, but the brother supposed, of course, he would outliv the sister, who was fragil and delicate.

It so happened, however, that he died first and his money fell into the hands of the sister, who gave it all, both the brother's and her own, to build the college for young women. And thus the money of the man who hated women has reverted to the use of women after all. To the college has been added the Lilly Hall of Science, the gift of a well-known and greatly beloved Liberal man. It cost upward of $30,000, and bears this inscription: "The gift of Alfred Theodore Lilly. To teach the truth in nature."

To return to the Cosmian Sunday-school, the children there were all smart-looking, bright, and intelligent above the average of the ordinary Sunday-school-goers. Their faces indicate that they will be abundantly able to take up the work and go on with it when older Liberals shall hav laid it down.

While in Florence my stay was made very pleasant in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Dwight Ross and their three healthy and handsome children, Ally, Bertie, and Mabel.

In the afternoon Ally took his mother, Mrs. Cary, and myself to drive through the beautiful town, and across the long bridge (1,080 feet) that spans the Connecticut river, and into the old-fashioned town of Hadley. The scenery is very fine. On the right is the Holyoke range of mountains, cool and inviting. Little islands, like bits of emerald, dot the river here and there, while shrubbery and great trees grow close to the river's edge, swaying gracefully in their new summer dresses, and seem always to sing of peace and calm content. The village of Hadley seems to be located principally on two streets, a mile or so in length, with a stretch of green, or, it might be called, a common, lying between them the length of the streets. The houses are very quaint, and seem to hav been built a long while—some of them, perhaps, in Colonial times.

The place used to be famous for the manufacture of brooms, and great quantities of broom-corn and tobacco hav been grown there. The town is also celebrated for having been the home of Goffe and Whalley, two of the judges who condemned Charles I. They sought shelter in Hadley when they fled to this country, and lived there in quiet retirement for fifteen years, when Whalley died. Goffe lived a few years longer, when he died.

A great calm seemed resting on the old gambrel-roofed houses, and very few people seemed stirring. It was Sunday, and perhaps they were resting. S. H. W.

The May Picnic.

When I was ten years old, the teachers of our school got up a picnic. It was to be on the 7th of May. The parents of all the scholars were invited. We started about 8 o'clock in the morning up into a beautiful cañon about twelve miles distant. We went through two towns noted for their great quantities of fruit, such as oranges, lemons, apples, peaches, and pears. After passing these towns, we had to go through a large belt of sand and brush and willow-trees. Then we began to go uphill. After we got up the hill, there the scenery began. Flowers of all kinds and colors, shapes and sizes, green grass about ten inches high. We crossed a little brook about three feet wide; its banks were covered with moss and flowers. Then we came into a grove of oak-trees, and there we stopped. It was about 11 o'clock. After everyone arrived and things were quiet, we had a few songs, recitations, and dialogs. Then we ate our dinner. After dinner most of the party set out to climb the hills, and a few went up farther in the cañon to the coal mines. I did not go far up the hills, for I became dizzy and had to come down again. We had two large swings for the children and young folks. The party of folks started home about 4 o'clock and arrived at home between 7 and 8. So ended a very pleasant day for all.

MARTHA DEMING (aged fifteen).

Children's Sayings.

Bernice, who is six, had visited the school, and afterward played school by arranging the chairs in a row and asking questions. This was one of them: "If there were two little Indians and one ran off and the other stayed at home and got burnt up, how much would a nigger cost?"

She once found an orthodox angel with wings of the regulation style, and said: "I do declare, mamma, if here isn't a woman bird."

Correspondence.

KIMBALL, DAK., May 17, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav not seen any letters from this part of the country, so I thought I would write one. Pa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it was first printed. I like to look at the pictures and read the Children's Corner. I think the "Badger Boy" will come out ahead. Pa let a gentleman read THE TRUTH SEEKER several times, and he liked it so well he subscribed for it. I guess this is all for this time.

Yours truly, HENRY J. YEAGH.

VERSAILLES, IND., May 20, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As we hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for so many years, I thought I would write my first letter to you and the Corner. We love to look at the pictures, and I think the subjects could not be better illustrated. The only Liberal lecturer I ever heard was Mr. Remsburg. His subject was "Sabbath Breaking." I wish more Liberals would lecture here, because they speak nothing but the truth. We hav three churches here, and go sometimes just for curiosity.

I went to school last winter, and studied grammar, arithmetic, history, physiology, algebra, and physical geography. I attended the fifth-grade examination this spring for graduation.

In our library we hav the fables "Arabian Nights," the Bible, and "Baron Munchausen" side by side. I hav read the life and some of the works of Thomas Paine, and Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon," and found them to be nothing but the truth all the way through.

Wishing success to the seekers of truth, I remain, Your Liberal friend,

LENORA STOOKINGER (aged sixteen).

NAPA, CAL., May 6, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav seen no letters from Napa City, I will try to write one. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Investigator, and we all like them very much, especially the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Miss Wixon, don't you think that a great many girls go to church and Sunday-school just to show off their nice dresses? Once in a great while I go to Sunday-school to hear what the teacher says, but every word that she says I know there is no truth in it. I think the "Badger Boy at Sunday-School" is splendid, don't you? Papa bought us some nice Liberal books, and I hav read nearly all of them. I hav two brothers and one sister, all older than myself. My sister graduated from the Napa Young Ladies' Seminary about a year ago.

Mr. Putnam lectured here about a year ago, and so did Colonel Ingersoll. I think it is just wicked and mean in the Christians to call Colonel Ingersoll "Bob," don't you?

We hav two very cute little Indian ponies named Masco and Dora. I think that Francis Cornwall, of Colon, Mich., must be exceedingly smart to write locals when he is only eleven years of age.

I will now close my letter, and hope that you and all the truth seekers may liv long to see what you harvest. Yours truly,

LOLA GRIGSBY.

P.S.—My age is thirteen years. L. G.

OAK MILLS, KAN., May 28, E.M. 288.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I again take the pleasure of writing you a few lines to let you know I still take an interest in your good work. I will be seventeen years old in September, yet I stick to my creed, and defend it the same as I would were I an old man.

Abraham Lincoln said, "We must not waver in the support of a cause which we deem to be just." Lincoln is truly right. We should endeavor to stand bravely for our cause and defend it through trials and perils. We should not fear to speak our honest thoughts, but make them known to the world. Let theology curse and rave; we do not care.

I hav read Colonel Ingersoll's eulogy on Roscoe Conkling, and pronounce it the most eloquent and true estimate of Conkling's character ever written. Of all the eulogies I ever read there is nothing like it for logic, eloquence, and sublimity. It will add another step to Ingersoll's fame as an orator.

How is "Father Hacker" prospering? I hope the debt will be lifted from his little home.

Our school will be out Wednesday. We hav a good teacher, and I am proud to say that she is free from the dogmas of priestcraft, superstition, and the church. I hav written an essay on "Education" for the last day of school.

Well, I hav run out of fuel, so I must close, ever remaining, Your Infidel friend,

GEO. J. REMSBURG.

VERSAILLES, IND., May 20, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am seventeen years old, and hav constantly read THE TRUTH SEEKER for so many years and hav never written once, so I thought I would write a few lines to you.

I went to school last winter, and studied higher arithmetic, algebra, philosophy, and English history. Any person who has made a study of English history knows what Christianity has done for England as well as our country.

When I graduated two years ago, there were a great many in my class who spoke on some pious subject. One boy especially spoke on a stupid religious subject, in which he spoke of Colonel Ingersoll as having the wrong kind of an education, etc. I hope he will liv to see the time when the majority of the people will hav just such an education as Ingersoll. There was no piety in the least in my piece and it was as highly applauded as the rest. If you will hav enough space for it and no objections, I will write it for the Corner next time that I write. The subject is, "Several Valuable Hints."

I hav been reading Dickens's "Pictures from Italy" and "Uncommercial Traveler." Hav you read many of his books? I hav read almost all of his novels. He described churches and services so truly that they appeared ridiculous. The Christians do not read his works because he tells the truth in describing the religious proceedings, etc. They shrink from the truth.

I hav read the "Life of Paine," and also Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon." My father has D. M. Bennett's works, and numerous other Liberal books. He seldom leaves home Sundays, but stays and keeps it holy.

I think my letter will be very trying to your patience, so I will close, hoping my first letter will be published.

With best wishes, I remain,
Your Freethinker friend,
ANNIE H. STOOKINGER.

[We will cheerfully giv space to the essay, if it is not too long for our columns. Yes, we hav read nearly all the books written by Dickens, and with great pleasure.—ED. C. C.]

NORWEGIAN CONSULATE.
SALONICA, TURKEY, May 2, 1888

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: I would hav answered your letter before, but I am so busy at school all day, and so tired at night, that I hardly can hav any spare time.

I want to tell you about Salonica, it is such a funny place and very full of people of all kinds. In the street you meet Turks, Greeks, Jews, Gypsies, Italians, and Germans; in fact, people from all nations come here. There is only one family of Americans here, and the father's name is Sampson. He is missionary to the Greeks. Mrs Sampson, too, has a new baby; her name is Helen Lake Sampson. Our baby is to be called Lily Regina.

I went to see a mosque here in Salonica. It was once a church, before the Turks took Salonica; and before that it was a heathen temple. Well, I thought it would interest you to know that out in the yard of this mosque is the stone pulpit that, it is said, St. Paul preached in when he preached to the Jews. It has figures of men and horses carved on it, and is very curious; and everybody who comes to Salonica goes to see it. One day when I go to town—we liv in the country near the sea, about one mile off—I will buy you a photograph of this pulpit.

Seven years ago when we were living in a village opposit Cassandra we were carried off into the mountains by brigands. I was four years old then. I was the only child my father and mother had then, as my two sisters had died six months before the brigands took us. But it is such a long story that I must tell you about it at another time. I suppose Uncle Fish knows all about it, because he has known mamma for many, many years.

"Apples of Gold" arrived by yesterday's mail. Thank you so very much for it. I was afraid it was lost; it is more than three months since you posted it. I hav not commenced to read it.

Now it is time I should close this letter of mine. Ever yours affectionately,

DAISY SUTER.

A CABIN-BOY on board a ship, the captain of which was a very religious man, was called up to be whipped for some misdemeanor. Little Jack went crying and trembling to the captain. "Kind sir," said he, "will you wait till I say my prayers?" "Yes," was the stern reply. "Well, then," replied little Jack, looking up and smiling triumphantly, "I'll say them when I get ashore!"—Freethinker.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Old Opinions.

Once we thought that power eternal
Had decreed the woes of man;
That the human heart was wicked
Since its pulses first began;
That the earth was but a prison,
Dark and joyless at the best,
And that men were born for evil,
And imbibed it from the breast;
That 'twas vain to think of urging
Any earthly progress on.
Old opinions! rags and tatters!
Get you gone! get you gone!

Once we thought all human sorrows
Were predestined to endure;
That, as man had never made them,
Men were impotent to cure;
That the few were born superior,
Though the many might rebel—
Those to sit at Nature's table,
These to pick the crumbs that fell;
Those to liv upon the fatness,
These the starvelings lean and wan.
Old opinions! rags and tatters!
Get you gone! get you gone!

Once we thought that holy Freedom
Was a cursed and tainted thing;
Foe of Peace, and Law, and Virtue;
Foe of magistrate and king;
That all vile, degraded passion
Ever followed in her path;
Lust and Plunder, War and Rapine,
Tears, and Anarchy, and Wrath;
That the angel was a cruel,
Haughty, blood-stained Amazon.
Old opinions! rags and tatters!
Get you gone! get you gone!

Once we thought it right to foster
Local jealousies and pride;
Right to hate another nation
Parted from us by a tide;
Right to go to war for glory,
Or extension of domain;
Right, through fear of foreign rivals,
To refuse the needful grain;
Right, to bar it out till Famin
Drew the bolt with fingers wan.
Old opinions! rags and tatters!
Get you gone! get you gone!

Once we thought that Education
Was a luxury for the few;
That to giv it to the many
Was to giv it scope undue;
That 'twas foolish to imagin
It could be as free as air,
Common as the glorious sunshine
To the child of want and care;
That the poor man, educated,
Quarreled with his toil anon.
Old opinions! rags and tatters!
Get you gone! get you gone!

Old opinions, rags and tatters!
Ye are worn—ah, quite threadbare!
We must cast you off forever—
We are wiser than we were;
Never fitting, always cramping,
Letting in the wind and sleet,
Chilling us with rheums and agues,
Or inflaming us with heat.
We hav found a mental raiment
Purer, whiter, to put on.
Old opinions! rags and tatters!
Get you gone! get you gone!

Colonel Ingersoll s Popularity.

From the New York Sun.

The great and widespread interest excited by the discussion of Christian theology between Colonel Ingersoll and Mr. Gladstone may fitly be called a sign of the times.

Religious discussion and theological controversy were formerly far away from the general public interest, though there is no other department of literature so voluminous; but when it became known that the North American Review for the present month would contain Colonel Ingersoll's reply to the English statesman, there immediately sprang up an enormous advance demand for the publication.

This review was originally a quarterly of a highly respectable reputation and a very limited circulation, so that when it was purchased by Mr. Thorndike Rice ten years ago, and brought from Boston to New York, it was almost unknown to the great mass of readers. Now, because of his skilful editing, it has become one of the most extensivly circulated monthly magazines in the world, the chief of the English magazines of the same general class being left far behind in that respect. But of all the many subjects of popular interest which hav been discussed in its pages under the editorship of Mr. Rice, there is none that has approached this controversy between faith and Infidelity in its attraction for the public.

That extraordinary interest manifested in a demand for Colonel Ingersoll's views and arguments that will probably run up the sales of a relativly high-priced magazine to at least one hundred thousand copies, is, of course, explained in large part by the charm of the literary style of that opponent of religion. If Colonel Ingersoll were as dry and dull a writer as the theological controversialist commonly is, the North American Review would not now be selling like a fresh novel by Clark Russell. But, no matter how alluring the style, there would not be the present eager demand for Colonel Ingersoll's assault upon the religion of the Bible if the public interest in the subject were not deeply stirred at this particular time.

It is significant, too, that the demand for the words of the now famous Infidel far exceeds the demand for the arguments in reply to him, whether they come from a clergyman like the Rev. Dr. Field, or a statesman of world-wide distinction like Mr. Gladstone. Five, perhaps ten times as many people read the iconoclastic arguments of Colonel Ingersoll as pay attention to what is written by the others in defense of biblical story and theological dogma.

This profound and widespread interest in what he says on the subject is the more significant because it is exhibited in chief part by those who were brought up in religious faith, and by ordained teachers and ministers of religion themselvs. Yet the attacks of the Infidels of the past hav been mild in comparison with Ingersoll's. He does not assail the mere form and ornamentation of the ecclesiastical edifice, but strikes at the very foundation of religious belief as a relic of childish superstition.

This great popularity of Colonel Ingersoll as a writer, and the enormous audience to which he appeals whenever he rises to make war upon the Christian faith, are facts of the day to which we call the undivided attention of churches and theologians now at variance within the citadel of religion, upon which this Infidel leader is gathering his hosts for assault.

Free Trade as a Religious Question.

Thomas G. Shearman to Rhode Island Manufacturers.

I hate this whole system of protection, because in its very nature it does and must always tax the poor for the sole benefit of the rich. I hate it because it is thoroughly unchristian. Think for a moment of its practical operation. It is founded upon appeals to international prejudices and hatreds. Its very life and essence consist in stirring up jealousies between one nation and another. More than this, as a practical fact and a necessary result of its working, it stimulates hatred toward other nations in precise proportion to the degree in which they are of the same race and religion as ourselvs.

You subscribe liberally for the conversion of the heathen. Suppose that some missionary were to come among us now and demonstrate that if we would only send out fifty missionaries forthwith, we should certainly succeed in converting the entire population of some heathen country to Christianity within a year. How liberally you would all subscribe! My friends Senators Chace and Aldrich would undoubtedly gladly contribute $1,000 each. But, toward the end of the year, a telegram would come announcing that 500 000 heathens had been converted to Christianity and instructed in civilization. On the instant that this news reaches my friend Chace he will rush across the capital, with a face white as a sheet, in search of the ways and means committee, and as soon as he recovers his breath he will cry out: "Gentlemen, for heaven's sake clap a new tariff upon all the productions of Borioboola Gha!" The ways and means committee would inquire, with surprise: "Why, what has happened?" Your Christian senator would feebly reply: "Good heavens! gentlemen! hav you not heard the news? The whole population of Borioboola Gha has been converted from cannibalism to Christianity; they are wearing clothes, hav become civilized, and are going, as a matter of course, to manufacture. Unless you put a duty of at least fifty per cent upon all their productions, we shall be ruined by Christian cheap labor."

Do you say that this is an exaggeration? We do not need to enter the realm of fancy in order to prove that this is the natural result. Do you protect yourselvs against heathen countries? No; anything from China, Tartary, and Patagonia, which is not produced in Christian countries, is admitted free. Raw silk and tea, which are peculiarly heathen productions, are not taxed. But the Mohammedans are a little nearer to us. They believe, as we do, in one god; and the next consequence is that everything that is produced by Mohammedans pays, as a rule, higher duties than the productions of heathens. But the moment that you come to deal with countries where the people profess to believe in the same God and the same savior in whom we believe you instantly raise the tariff to a much higher rate. The productions of Catholic countries, such as France and Italy, pay three times as heavy duties as those which you impose upon heathen countries. When you deal with Protestant countries, such as North Germany and Holland, you raise your rates of protection still higher. But you never attain the climax of your fear and hate until you begin to deal with England, the country whose people speak your language, from which you hav derived all your literature and all your religion, with the ministers of which your ministers exchange pulpits, the people of which believe in the same God and the same savior, hav the same forms of religion, and read the same Bible. You and they pray from the same prayer-book if you are Episcopalians; sing the same hymns if you are Puritans; or as Methodists, Baptists, Catholics, or Quakers believe and worship precisely alike. In short, you hav just the same religion, you desire to go to just the same heaven, and you are all dear brothers in Christ until the English Christian wants to sell you some of his goods, when you instantly cry for a wall of fire to separate you from your dear brother Christians; and you put up this wall to the best of your ability in a high tariff. And this is what you call Christianity! The Mohammedans are incapable of such meanness and selfishness toward each other. It is reserved for Christians to set such an example to the world that both Mohammedans and pagans, looking upon us, shall say truly, "See how these Christians hate one another!"

Practicing Before God Almighty for the Benefit of the Prince of Wales.

From the Standard.

If he outlivs his mamma, and the British social system holds together, the prince of Wales will some day become the Defender of the Faith and the head of a great Christian organization. It is therefore pleasing to learn that even in his present caterpillar condition of heir apparent he has done something for the cause of God. And it is doubly pleasing to Americans to know that his doughtiest—perhaps even his only—blow on behalf of pure religion and undefiled was struck right here in the city of New York. The fact will reconcile many to Christianity and increase, if possible, their respect for the good prince. Mr. H. E. Krebiel tells the story in the June number of Harper's Magazine.

For a generation or more before the civil war members of Trinity church congregation had been trying, without success, to hav portions of the service sung by surpliced choirs of boys, after the fashion in English cathedrals. Mr. Cutler, the organist, was peculiarly activ in the matter, and succeeded so far as to drive all the women out of the choir and substitute boys in their places. But there he stuck. The congregation wouldn't stand the surplices, as savoring too much of Romanism. Somebody presented a full set of choir vestments, but Mr. Cutler was forbidden to use them, and they were consequently put away among the other treasures of the church:

This was the aspect of the case when Mr. Cutler found an unexpected but very powerful ally in the heir apparent to the throne of Great Britain. In the fall of 1860 New York prepared to receive a visit from the prince of Wales. He was to be in the city from the 11th to the 15th of October, and the 14th being Sunday, he accepted an invitation to attend divine service at Trinity church. Mr. Cutler's opportunity had arrived. Without delay he and his associates in the cause laid before the church authorities a request for permission to use the idle vestments. Their argument was as simple as it was effectiv. They represented that the spectacle of a lot of boys in roundabouts and neck gear of assorted styles and colors sitting in the chancel would be disturbing to the prince's sense of propriety. Forthwith Mr. Cutler was instructed to put the boys in the new-fangled frocks for the edification of the prince, and lest the wearers should mar the solemnity of the occasion by awkward movements in them . . . they were donned two or three Sundays before the prince's visit, for rehearsal. . . . It had taken a long time to get the choir into vestments, but once in, it was not taken out. Surpliced choirs had come to stay in Trinity parish.

There! Isn't that a delightful story? Doesn't it illustrate beautifully the intense Americanism, the deep religious feeling, the anxiety to know the right and to do it, of the Trinity people. The church, you see, was the house of God—specially set apart for and consecrated to his service. Everything done in it was to be ad majorem Dei gloriam. The congregation kicked against a surpliced choir as savoring of Romanism, and consequently disrespectful to the most high. But the prince of Wales came along with his fine sense of religious propriety, and the rulers of the congregation saw a new light. In their revised version of the scriptures they found the text, What the prince of Wales hath cleansed, that call not thou common. So they put the choir boys into surplices, and to make sure that they should wear them gracefully before the future king of England, they made them first rehearse for two or three Sundays before God almighty.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, have in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape have led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

WHAT MOSES SAW WHEN HE WAS HID IN THE ROCK.

And it shall come to pass, while my glory passeth by, that I will put thee in a cleft of the rock, and will cover thee with my hand while I pass by: And I will take away my hand, and thou shalt see my back parts; but my face shall not be seen.—Ex. xxxiii, 22, 23.

Odds and Ends.

THE Sundays don't seem half so long after the fishing season opens.

"MAMMA," inquired Ellie, "do tortoise-shell cats hav shells like turtles?"

ACTRESSES, as a class, marry to divorce and divorce to marry. As a paradox is a proposition seemingly absurd, this is a paradox.

CUSTOMER (to Mr Isaacstein): "The coat is about three sizes too big." Mr. Isaacstein (impressivly): "Mine frent, dat coat make you so proud you vill grow into it."

A KANSAS school-teacher offered a prize to the scholar who would come to school with the cleanest face. The result was that he was unable to recognize some of his pupils the next day.

SWEET boy visitors: "Where is the cat and dog, Mrs. Blank?" "We havn't any, my dear." "That's funny." "Why is it funny, pet?" "'Cause mamma said you and Mr. Blank lived a regular cat-and-dog life."

MRS. WHEATDEAL: "Yes, my son is going to marry a daughter of one of the best families in Boston." Mrs Backbay: "Ah, indeed? Chicago and Boston! Pork and beans! What a delightful combination!"

A LITTLE boy in New England was questioned as to whether he had ever stolen any grapes. "Yes," he replied, "but I don't mind if only God and my brother see me, for God can't tell mamma if he wants to, and I know Ralph won't."

"I AM surprised, Bobby,' said his father reprovingly, "that you should strike your little brother. Don't you know that it is cowardly to hit one smaller than yourself?" "Then why do you hit me, pa?" inquired the boy, with the air of one having the better of it.

TEACHER (infant Bible class): "Tommy Traddles may tell us where this passage is to be found: 'In my father's house there are many mansions. If it were not so, I would hav told you. I go to prepare a place for you.'" Tommy Traddles: "In de Ma l an' Express."

"I FIND, madam," said a young physician, "that your husband is suffering from overwork." "And will he hav to giv up his place under the government?" she asked, anxiously. "What's that? Is he a government official?" "Yes, sir." "H—m! I'll diagnose his case again. He probably needs exercise."

"ONE o' my hired men has got a notion he wants a fiddle," said an agriculturist to the dealer. "What might that secon'-hand one in the winder be wuth?" "That's a Stradivarius; it's worth $5,000." "I'll speak to the hired man about it," shouted the agriculturist as he backed out of the place; "he may not like that make."

FIRST pastor: "Do you attend the church conference to-day, Brother Haggs?" Second pastor: "No, I'm not feeling very well, and I've decided not to leave the house unless some matter of great importance calls me out." First pastor: "Er, I suppose you know that the case of Brother Harkins for undue familiarity with several sisters of his congregation is to be tried in the conference to-day?" Second pastor: "Wait a moment, brother, and I will get my coat and hat."

YOUNG wife: "John, I wish you would rock the baby." Young husband: "What'll I rock the baby for?" Y. W.: "Because he is not very well. And what's more, half of him belongs to you, and you should not object to rock him" Y H: "Well, don't half belong to you?" Y. W.: "Yes." Y H: "Well, you can rock your half, and let my half holler."

AT the close of an amateur theatrical performance a gentleman was discovered in a fainting condition. Great beads of perspiration stood upon his brow, and his face was ashy white. "Great heavens! what is the trouble?" was the excited inquiry. "Ladies and gentlemen," gasped the unfortunate man, faintly, "I'm the author of the play."

ALAS! what has become of those bristling horrors of Anarchy, land-confiscation, the strike and the boycott, which but a little while ago hovered like an Acheronian cloud over the broad sheets of our daily press? Gone, gone, all gone; pounded flat into the dismal obscurity of three lines on an inside page by the irresistible might of the American baseball bat!—Puck.

MARRIED lady: "Mr. Nervinbone, I hav been watching your late flirtation with a good deal of anxiety, for I am a good friend of yours." Mr. N.: "Ah, thanks, my dear madam." M. L: "It reminds me very much of the moth fluttering about the candle." Mr. N. (sympathetically): "Yes, but what am I to do? The poor girl will persist, and I can't resort to violence, you know." Married lady collapses.

"THE trouble with women," said Smitherimpkins, "is that they want us to hav fun their way. They want us to sit in the house and talk about the weather, sir; to discuss the eternal mysteries of dressmaking and cooking, sir; and to read novels, sir, and worship babies. They can't see why a man should want to go to a club or a public dinner, sir, or take in a baseball game or a horse-race. They want us to do as they do, and enjoy ourselvs in their way, sir. But did you ever hear of a man wanting a woman to hav fun in his way? No, sir; not much. You never heard of any man's trying to persuade his wife to go around the corner, sir, to a nice, quiet place, si , where some very elegant gentlemen were engaged in a rubber of cards, sir, and to smoke cigars and drink beer with the party, sir, and sit up till the cock has made himself hoarse with crowing, sir, and then meander home singing. Did you ever hear of any man's trying to persuade a woman to hav fun that way—his way? No, sir; not by a jugful, sir."

Gems of Thought.

IF the present be man's highest civilization, a general suicide is desirable. If the policy of Bismarck, Beaconsfield, and Victoria is to rule the world, the sooner we wind up the tragedy and make our final exit the better. Herein the animals are in advance of us; and for their sakes one would not begrudge the world a longer span of existence. It is true the brutes will fight; but they do so for some definit advantage. Man fights for an idea, a whim, a sentiment. The beast fights on his own account; man fights for his worst foes, and kills the poor slaves of other tyrants for the purpose of strengthening the tyranny of his own masters. When will ever Englishmen awake to the plain fact that those who send them to war are their worst foes?—J. Symes.

THE state of war natural to all creatures. War is an attempt to take by violence from others a part of what they hav and we want. . . . This the true foundation of grandeur and heroism, and of the distinction of degrees among men. War therefore necessary to establish subordination, and to found cities, kingdoms, etc. . . . The greatest part of mankind loves war more than peace. They are but few and mean spirited that liv in peace with all men. . . . The inclination to war universal: those that can not, or dare not, make war in person, employ others to do it for them. This maintains bullies, bravoes, cutthroats, lawyers, soldiers, etc. Most professions would be useless, if all were peaceable. Hence, brutes want neither smiths nor lawyers, magistrates nor joiners, soldiers nor surgeons Brutes, having but narrow appetites, are incapable of carrying on or perpetuating war against their own species, or of being led out in troops multitudes to destroy one another. These prerogativs proper to man alone. . . . This matter to be more fully treated in the author's Panegyric on Mankind.—Swift.

RELIGION will never unify the world, and never will giv peace to mankind. There has been more war in the last eighteen hundred years than during any similar period within historic times. War will be abolished, if it ever is abolished, not by religion, but by intelligence. . . . There ought to be a national court to decide national difficulties. We consider a community civilized when the individuals of that community submit their differences to a legal tribunal; but there being no national court, nations now sustain, as to each other, the relation of savages—that is to say, each one must defend its rights by brute force. The establishment of a national court civilizes nations, and tends to do away with war.—Ingersoll.

IGNORANCE is a disease, and a deadly and dangerous disease. There are few things in the world more costly than an ignorant man.—Ernest Jones.

FOR the notion that evil is due to a malicious devil, we substitute the idea that it is the result of non-adjustment, due largely to our ignorance, that it is relativ, and the distinction between right and wrong has been learned by experience.—B. F. Underwood.

SUPPOSE that all the money wasted in cathedrals in the Middle Ages had been used for the construction of school-houses, academies, and universities, how much better the world would hav been! Suppose that instead of supporting hundreds of thousands of idle priests, the money had been given to men of science for the purpose of finding out something of benefit to the human race here in this world.—Ingersoll.

VOLTAIRE AND GIBBON.

The one was fire and fickleness, a child,
Most mutable in wishes, but in mind,
A wit as various—gay, grave, sage, or wild—
Historian, bard, philosopher, combined;
He multiplied himself among mankind,
The Proteus of their talents: but his own
Breathed most in ridicule—which, as the wind,
Blew where it listed, laying all things prone—
Now to o'erthrow a fool, and now to shake a throne.

The other, deep and slow, exhausting thought,
And hiving wisdom with each studious year,
In meditation dwelt, with learning wrought,
And shaped his weapon with an edge severe,
Sapping a solemn creed with solemn sneer;
The lord of irony—that master-spell,
Which stung his foes to wrath, which grew from fear,
And doomed him to the zealot's ready hell,
Which answers to all doubts so eloquently well.
—Byron.

IF I supposed the "Mosaic writer" to be inspired, as Mr. Gladstone does, it would not be consistent with my notions of respect for the supreme being to imagin him unable to frame a form of words which should accurately, or at least not inaccurately, express his own meaning. It is sometimes said that, had the statements contained in the first chapter of Genesis been scientifically true, they would hav been unintelligible to ignorant people; but how is the matter mended if, being scientifically untrue, they must needs be rejected by instructed people?—Huxley.

THE Commercial Advertiser describes the recent action of the Irish bishops thus: "The Irish bishops hav sent to Rome a document, apropos of the pope's famous rescript, which admits the right of the holy see to interfere in national affairs where morality is concerned. The document in effect tells his holiness that if he had been a little more sure in regard to his facts he would hav been a little less certain in regard to the morality or immorality of the boycott and the plan of campaign. The bishops would hav the pope reverse his decision."

AMONG the Yale men who will receive degrees at the coming commencement are four Japanese students. One of them, who is a resident graduate, will be made a doctor of philosophy. Another, the son of a Japanese nobleman, now a minister of finance, will graduate from the law school. A third, who graduates from the same school, is one of the brightest men in his class, and a contestant for the John A. Porter prize. The most interesting of them is Shinkichi Shegimi, of the scientific school. He is a typical Japanese, four feet tall and weighs ninety pounds. He came to this country without money or friends, drifted to Yale, was taken in charge by President Dwight and members of the faculty, and now graduates with honors.

A BANGOR young woman on Saturday evening went into a bookstore and asked the clerk, whom she knew well, to pick her out a good novel to read next day. The novel was selected, and the clerk deftly substituted for it a New Testament, made a neat package, and thought that he had played a good joke on the girl. On Monday morning he heard from the joke. The young woman entered the store very white in the face and banged the Testament down on the counter. "I'd hav thrown that in the fire," she said, "if there had been any way in which I could hav made you pay for it. I'll never buy a cent's worth of you again, so there! Giv me the book I bought on Saturday," and then she flounced out.

MARIE GENEVIEVE DU SAORE CŒUR has proclaimed herself a prophetess at Chartres, the French diocese most favored by supernatural visions. She declares that Jesus appears to her in visions, and says that he desires the foundation of a religious house at Loigny, where there was a fight between the Prussians and the Pontifical Zouaves in 1870. This house is to be the parent one of an order of the Spouses of the Sacred Heart of Penitent Jesus, and the nuns who enter it are to devote themselvs to prayer and pious works, so as to avert the divine anger from France and bring about the restoration of the monarchy under Charles XI. She refused to retract her story, and says: "God confounds the proud and exalts the simple. A bishop treated Joan of Arc as an impostor, and the voices which inspired her as satanic suggestions."

WALT WHITMAN is slowly recovering from the attack which nearly cost him his life recently. His physician, Dr. Bucke, says: "Mr. Whitman has never been well since his attack of paralysis in 1873. He rallied from that and seemed to improve until 1880, when he paid an extended visit to my home in Canada. Since then he has had frequent attacks, from which he rallied, but after each he was left weaker. It is his magnificent constitution, and but for the paralysis, which was due to the poison taken into his system while acting as nurse in the hospitals during the war, he ought to liv to be ninety at least. I do not know that I ever saw a man of his age who has maintained such a magnificent physique, despite these adverse circumstances."

ONE of the editors of the American Hebrew visited the Hebrew-Christian church of New York, to observe the workings of that spiritual manufactory. He found that the congregation numbered fifty, nearly two-thirds of whom were non-Jews. There were present twelve Israelites, whom it is positivly known were there simply for curiosity. There were three or perhaps four Jews who professed to participate in the service. It was announced that on that special occasion four Jews were to be formally admitted to fellowship in the Hebrew-Christian church, but one had not put in an appearance. Two were baptized, one of whom had already gone through the operation in Europe, and the third wavered. This is the record for that evening. In commenting on the affair our contemporary says that it defies the missionaries to point out a half dozen intelligent Jews who hav become converts from conviction and without receiving material benefit as a reward of their apostacy.—Jewish Times.

THE New York World says: "The recent miserable calumny upon the president, branded and set at rest forever by Mrs. Cleveland's characterization of it as a 'wicked and heartless lie,' had its origin in what is pleased to call itself 'Washington society.' For months before an unsophisticated and credulous clergyman from Massachusetts gave the libel publicity, it was passed from mouth to ear in certain circles at the capital that love to see themselvs described as 'fashionable,' and rolled as a choice bit of gossip under tongues whose owners were not above paying court to the household that they slandered. A proneness to gossip and backbite, to stab with innuendo, and to easily believe evil reports of its members is as marked a feature of society to-day as it was when Sheridan depicted and satirized it in the 'School for Scandal.' Gossip is the sauce-piquant of society tattle and chatter. Scandal acts as a fillip to stir the sluggish spirit of fashionable ennui. It is especially rife at a political capital where persons count for so much and principles and policies for so little as has been the case at Washington in recent years. There is needed more of that true manliness and real womanhood that will turn the back upon tale-bearers and scorn to be made either the pedlers or the receptacles of scandal and gossip."

Economics.

Colonel Ingersoll's Economical and Political Opinions.

From an Interview in the Press.

A representativ of the Press had an exceedingly interesting talk with Col. Robert G. Ingersoll yesterday afternoon. Colonel Ingersoll expressed himself very freely on the subject of the relations of labor and capital to each other, and on the duty of the laboring man in the present juncture. Following is the interview:

What, in your opinion, is the condition of labor in this country as compared with that abroad?

In the first place, it is self-evident that if labor received more in other lands than in this the tide of emigration would be changed. The workingmen would leave our shores. People who believe in free trade are always telling us that the laboring man is paid much better in Germany than in the United States, and yet nearly every ship that comes from Germany is crammed with Germans, who, for some unaccountable reason, prefer to leave a place where they are doing well and come to one where they must do worse.

The same thing can be said of Denmark and Sweden, of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and of Italy. The truth is that in all those lands the laboring man can earn just enough to-day to do the work of to-morrow; everything he earns is required to get food enough in his body and rags enough on his back to work from day to day, to toil from week to week. There are only three luxuries within his reach—air, light, and water; probably a fourth might be added—death.

In those countries the few own the land, the few hav the capital, the few make the laws, and the laboring man is not a power; his opinion is neither asked nor heeded. The employers pay as little as they can. When the world becomes civilized everybody will want to pay what things are worth, but now capital is perfectly willing that labor shall remain at the starvation line. Competition on every hand tends to put down wages. The time will come when the whole community will see that justice is economical. If you starve laboring men you increase crime; you multiply, as they do in England, workhouses, hospitals, and all kinds of asylums, and these public institutions are for the purpose of taking care of the wrecks that hav been produced by greed and stinginess and meanness—i. e., by the ignorance of capital.

What effect has the protectiv tariff on the condition of labor in this country?

To the extent that the tariff keeps out the foreign article it is a direct protection to American labor. Everything in this country is on a larger scale than in any other. There is far more generosity among the manufacturers and merchants and millionaires and capitalists of the United States than among those of any other country, although they are bad enough and mean enough here.

But the great thing for the laboring man in the United States is that he is regarded as a man. He is a unit of political power. His vote counts just as much as that of the richest and most powerful. The laboring man has to be consulted. The candidate has either to be his friend, or to pretend to be his friend, before he can succeed. A man running for the presidency could not say the slightest word against the laboring man, or calculated to put a stain upon industry, without destroying every possible chance of success. Generally every candidate tries to show that he is a laboring man, or that he was a laboring man, or that his father was before him. There is in this country very little of the spirit of caste—the most infamous spirit that ever infested the heartless breast or the brainless head of a human being.

What will be the effect on labor of a departure in American policy in the direction of free trade?

If free trade could be adopted to-morrow there would be an instant shrinkage of values in this country. Probably the immediate loss would equal $20,000,000,000—that is to say, one-third of the value of the country. No one can tell its extent. All things are so interwoven that to destroy one industry cripples another, and the influence keeps on until it touches the circumference of human interests.

I believe that labor is a blessing. It never was and never will be a curse. It is a blessed thing to labor for your wife and children, for your father and mother, and for the ones you love. It is a blessed thing to hav an object in life—something to do—something to call into play your best thoughts, to develop your faculties, and to make you a man. How beautiful, how charming, are the dreams of the young mechanic, the artist, the musician, the actor, and the student! How perfectly stupid must be the life of a young man with nothing to do, no ambition, no enthusiasm—that is to say, nothing of the divine in him! The young man with an object in life, of whose brain a great thought, a great dream, has taken possession, and in whose heart there is a great, throbbing hope—he looks forward to success—to wife, children, home—all the blessings and sacred joys of human life. He thinks of wealth, and fame, and honor, and of a long, genial, golden, happy autumn.

Work givs the feeling of independence, of self-respect. A man who does something necessarily puts a value on himself. He feels that he is a part of the world's force. The idler—no matter what he says, no matter how scornfully he may look at the laborer—in his very heart knows exactly what he is; he knows that he is a counterfeit, a poor, worthless imitation of a man.

But there is a vast difference between work and what I call "toil." What must be the life of a man who can earn only $1 or $2 a day? If this man has a wife and a couple of children, how can the family liv? What must they eat? What must they wear? From the cradle to the coffin they are ignorant of any luxury of life. If the man is sick, if one of the children dies, how can doctors and medicins be paid for? How can the coffin or the grave be purchased? These people liv on what might be called "the snow line"—just at that point where trees end and the mosses begin. What are such lives worth? The wages of months would hardly pay for the ordinary dinner of a family of a rich man. The savings of a whole life would not purchase one fashionable dress or the lace on it. Such a man could not save enough during his whole life to pay for the flowers of a fashionable funeral.

And yet how often hundreds of thousands of persons who spend thousands of dollars every year on luxuries really wonder why the working people should complain! They are astonished when a car-driver objects to working fourteen hours a day. Men giv millions of dollars to carry the gospel to the heathen and leave their own neighbors without bread; and these same people insist on closing libraries and museums of art on Sunday, and yet Sunday is the only day that these institutions can be visited by the poor.

They even want to stop the street-cars so that these workers, these men and women, cannot go to the parks or the fields on Sunday. They want stages stopped on fashionable avenues so that the rich may not be disturbed in their prayers and devotions.

The condition of the workingman, even in America, is bad enough. If free trade will not reduce wages, what will? If manufactured articles become cheaper the skilled laborers of America must work cheaper or stop producing the articles. Everyone knows that most of the value of a manufactured article comes from labor. Think of the difference between the value of a pound of cotton and a pound of the finest cotton cloth; between a pound of flax and enough point lace to weigh a pound; between a few ounces of paint, two or three yards of canvas, and a great picture; between a block of stone and a statue. Labor is the principal factor in price; when the price falls wages must go down.

I do not claim that protection is for the benefit of any particular class, but that it is for the benefit not only of that particular class but of the entire country. In England the common laborer expects to spend his old age in some workhouse. He is cheered through all his days of toil, through all his years of weariness, by the prospect of dying a respectable pauper. The women work as hard as the men. They work in the iron mills. They make nails, they dig coal, they toil in the fields. In Europe they carry the hod, they work like beasts and with beasts, until they lose almost the semblance of human beings—until they look inferior to the animals they drive. On the labor of these deformed mothers, of these bent and wrinkled girls, of little boys with the faces of old age, the heartless nobility liv in splendor and extravagant idleness. I am not now speaking of the French people, as France is the most prosperous country in Europe.

Let us protect our mothers, our wives, and our children from the deformity of toil, from the depths of poverty.

Is not the ballot an assurance to the laboring man that he can get fair treatment from his employer?

The laboring man in this country has the political power, provided he has the intelligence to know it and the intelligence to use it. In so far as laws can assist labor, the workingman has it in his power to pass such laws; but in most foreign lands the laboring man has really no voice. It is enough for him to work, and wait, and suffer, and emigrate. He can take refuge in the grave or go to America.

In the old country, where people hav been taught that all blessings come from the king, it is very natural for the poor to believe the other side of that proposition—that is to say, all evils come from the king, from the government. They are rocked in the cradle of this falsehood. So when they come to this country, if they are unfortunate, it is natural for them to blame the government.

The discussion of these questions, however, has already done great good. The workingman is becoming more and more intelligent. He is getting a better idea every day of the functions and powers and limitations of government, and if the problem is ever worked out—and by "problem" I mean the just and due relations that should exist between labor and capital—it will be worked out here in America.

What assurance has the American laborer that he will not be ultimately swamped by foreign immigration?

Most of the immigrants that come to America come because they want a home. Nearly every one of them is what you may call "land hungry." In his country to own a piece of land was to be respectable, almost a nobleman. The owner of a little land was regarded as the founder of a family—what you might call a "village dynasty." When they leave their nativ shores for America their dream is to become a landowner—to hav fields, to own trees, and to listen to the music of their own brooks.

The moment they arrive the mass of them seek the West, where land can be obtained. The great Northwest now is being filled with Scandinavian farmers, with persons from every part of Germany—in fact, from all foreign countries—and every year they are adding millions of acres to the plowed fields of the republic. This land hunger, this desire to own a home, to hav a field, to hav flocks and herds, to sit under your own vine and fig-tree, will prevent foreign immigration from interfering to any hurtful degree with the skilled workmen of America. These landowners, these farmers, become consumers of manufactured articles. They keep the wheels and spindles turning and the fires in the forges burning.

What do you think of Cleveland's message?

Only the other day I read a speech made by Hon. William D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, upon this subject, in which he says in answer to what he calls "the pueril absurdity of President Cleveland's assumption" that the duty is always added to the cost, not only of imported commodities, but to the price of like commodities produced in this country, "that the duties imposed by our government on sugar reduced to ad valorem were never so high as now, and the price of sugar was never in this country as low as it is now." He also showed that this tax on sugar has made it possible for us to produce sugar from other plants, and he givs the facts in relation to corn-sugar.

We are now using annually 19,000,000 bushels of corn for the purpose of making glucose or corn-sugar. He shows that in this industry alone there has been a capital invested of $11,000,000; that 732,000 acres of land are required to furnish the supply, and that this one industry now givs employment to about 22 000 farmers, about 5,000 laborers in factories, and that the annual value of this product of corn-sugar is over $17,000,000.

He also shows what we may expect from the cultivation of the beet. I advise everyone to read that speech, so that they may hav some idea of the capabilities of this country, of the vast wealth asking for development, of the countless avenues opened for ingenuity, energy, and intelligence.

Does the protectiv tariff cheapen the prices of commodities to the laboring man?

In this there are involved two questions. If the tariff is so low that the foreign article is imported, of course this tariff is added to the cost and must be paid by the consumer; but if the protectiv tariff is so high that the importer cannot pay it, and as a consequence the article is produced in America, then it depends largely upon competition whether the full amount of the tariff will be added to the article. As a rule, competition will settle that question in America, and the article will be sold as cheaply as the producers can afford.

For instance, if there is a tariff, we will say of fifty cents on a pair of shoes, and this tariff is so low that the foreign article can afford to pay it, then that tariff, of course, must be paid by the consumer. But suppose the tariff was $5 on a pair of shoes, that is to say, absolutely prohibitory, does any man in his senses say that $5 would be added to each pair of American shoes? Of course, the statement is the answer.

I think it is the duty of the laboring man in this country first to thoroughly post himself upon these great questions, to endeavor to understand his own interest as well as the interest of his country, and if he does I believe he will arrive at the conclusion that it is far better to hav this country filled with manufacturers than to be employed simply in raising raw material. I think he will come to the conclusion that we had better hav skilled labor here, and that it is better to pay for it than not to hav it. I think he will find that it is better for America to be substantially independent of the rest of the world. I think he will conclude that nothing is more desirable than the development of the American brain, and that nothing better can be raised than great and splendid men and women. I think he will conclude that the cloud coming from the factories, from the great stacks and chimneys, is the cloud on which will be seen, and always seen, the bow of American promis.

What hav you to say about tariff reform?

I hav this to say: that the tariff is for the most part the result of compromises—that is, one state wishing to hav something protected agrees to protect something else in some other state, so that, as a matter of fact, many things are protected that need no protection and many things are unprotected that ought to be cared for by the government.

I am in favor of a sensible reform of the tariff—that is to say, I do not wish to put it in the power of the few to practice extortion upon the many. Congress should always be wide awake, and wherever there is any abuse it should be corrected. At the same time, next to having the tariff just—next in importance is to hav it stable. It does us great injury to hav every dollar invested in manufactures frightened every time Congress meets. Capital should feel secure. Insecurity calls for higher interest, wants to make up for the additional risk; whereas, when a dollar feels absolutely certain that it is well invested, that it is not to be disturbed, it is satisfied with a very low rate of interest.

The present agitation—the message of President Cleveland upon these questions—will cost the country many hundred millions of dollars.

I see that some one has been charging that Judge Gresham is an Infidel.

I hav known Judge Gresham for many years, and of course hav heard him talk on many subjects, but I do not remember ever discussing with him a religious topic. I only know that he believes in allowing every man to express his opinions, and that he does not hate a man because he differs with him. I believe that he believes in intellectual hospitality, and that he would giv all churches equal rights, and would treat them all with the utmost fairness. I regard him as a fair-minded, intelligent, and honest man, and that is enough for me. I am satisfied with the way he acts, and care nothing about his particular creed. I like a manly man, whether he agrees with me or not. I believe that President Garfield was a minister of the Church of the Disciples—that made no difference to me. Mr. Blaine is a member of some church in Augusta—I care nothing for that. Whether Judge Gresham belongs to any church I do not know. I never asked him, but I know that he does not agree with me by a large majority.

In this country, where a divorce has been granted between church and state, the religious opinions of candidates should be let alone. To make the inquiry is a piece of impertinence—a piece of impudence. I hav voted for men of all persuasions and expect to keep right on, and if they are not civilized enough to giv me the liberty they ask for themselvs, why, I shall simply set them an example of decency.

What do you think of the political outlook?

The people of this country hav a great deal of intelligence. Tariff and free trade and protection and home manufactures and American industry—all these things will be discussed in every school-house of the country and in thousands and thousands of political meetings, and when next November comes you will see the Democratic party overthrown and swept out of power by a cyclone. All other questions will be lost sight of. Even the Prohibitionists would rather drink beer in a prosperous country than burst with cold water and hard times.

The preservation of what we hav got will be the great question. This is the richest country and the most prosperous country, and I believe that the people hav sense enough to continue the policy that has given them these results. I never want to see the civilization of the Old World, or rather the barbarism of the Old World, gain a footing on this continent. I am an American. I believe in American ideas—that is to say, in equal rights, and in the education and civilization of all the people.

The Principles of Freedom in Trade.

The history of man is largely composed of the record of his struggles for freedom, which may be defined as exemption from the power and control of another, or, in one word, unrestrictedness. Long and fierce hav been the conflicts; and though often the results hav been adverse to human progress, the battle has been renewed and in the end liberty has gained. To-day, in English-speaking lands, freedom is given in a large measure as to political rights, and the few restrictions that exist are nearing abolition; human slavery has disappeared, and the right to hold and express diverse religious and social opinions is professedly granted. In all departments of life, with one exception, there is a general recognition of the right of men to do as they please, provided they injure nobody. This one exception is trade. Men may not purchase their supplies outside of their own country except upon payment of a tax. The slavery of the past has been imposed by kings, priests, and conquering races; but the slavery of the present in trade is imposed by the victims themselvs, who incur voluntary bondage through mistaken theories and ignorance of their true interests.

The advocates of free trade base their demands upon the rights of man. They declare that all restrictions upon the right to buy in the cheapest market are infringements of human liberty. If the farmer in New Brunswick can buy a mowing-machine ten miles away in Maine more cheaply than he can six hundred miles away in Ontario, his natural rights are trampled on when he is fined for buying the article that costs least. They claim also that this natural right is for the man's interest, and that any interference with natural laws is in the end injurious. Their foundation principle, therefore, is fidelity to nature. Each region has its peculiar elements of productivness; each man has a special capacity for some sort of labor. The best results will follow when natural advantages are allowed free play. No man nor government is wise enough to place restrictions upon this freedom, for every benefit involves injuries none the less real because widely distributed and slightly recognized.

When governments began to regulate trade, the theory was maintained that a country was made so much the poorer by everything that went out of it, therefore exportation was prohibited or taxed. In latter days it has been claimed that the reverse is true and that a country is impoverished by importation, as it checks home production. Therefore importation is taxed. So, as doctors of medicin change their remedies, and in one generation cure fevers by bleeding and restriction of drinking, while in the next they banish the lancet and prescribe plenty of water, so the doctors of trade change their remedies to opposit efforts; and all the time beneficent nature, in spite of their quackeries, yields some measure of prosperity to faithful labor.

Many persons now sincerely believe that prosperity is promoted by taxing all imported articles that can be produced in the country to which they are brought, thus protecting home producers against foreign competitors. This is what is now called protection, and against this theory free traders draw up the following indictment:

1. Protection violates the laws of nature that grant freedom to men to buy and sell when, where, and how they please, and that indicate the pursuits to which lands and men are best adapted.

2. Protection increases the cost of supplies, and thus enhances the cost of products. Their export is therefore prevented; the producer is limited to the home market instead of the trade of the whole world, and overproduction and ruinous competition assail him oftener than if he operated in a larger field.

3. A tax on consumers for the benefit of producers is unjust in principle as well as injurious in practice. It puts the producer in the place of a pauper, who must receive the contributions of others toward his subsistence, and does a moral injury to him who thus receives gratuitous benefits.

4. By preventing foreign trade, protection fosters prejudice, and removes the greatest barrier to war; for there is no such promoter of peace as the intercourse of commerce.

5. Protection acts on the absurdity that it is better to do things ourselvs in the most costly way rather than accept a cheaper service from a man who livs under another flag.

6. By its restrictions, protection furnishes great inducements to dishonesty. Smuggling, bribery, lying, and perjury are direct results of its system.

7. Protection causes large numbers of men to be employed in collecting the revenues, who otherwise might be engaged in productiv labor.

8. Custom-houses put embarrassments and vexations in the way of trade, and hav often been centers of political corruption.

9. Protection, by artificial aid to industry and the removal of the stimulus of foreign competition, lessens invention, economy, and enterprise. A trade that is insured a profit by government lacks inducement to improve its methods.

10. Though protection is professed to be temporary, its beneficiaries never outgrow its aid, but only clamor for more help. The infant industries of the United States, which began ninety-nine years ago with a "temporary help" of five per cent, now receive fifty to a hundred per cent, and beg for increased aid as infants still.

11. Protection discriminates unjustly between industries, aiding some and neglecting others, but creating a claim for the protection of all. Owing to the limits of human wisdom, law-makers cannot discriminate as to the objects and the degree to which protection can be best applied. The strongest lobbyists usually get the most help.

12. Protection is a foe to civilization, not only by preventing the intercourse of people of different nations, thus fostering ignorance and suppressing the best means of enlightenment, but by hindering the introduction of industrial improvements made abroad.

13. Protection fosters selfishness, makes pauperism genteel, and disguises robbery so that the robbers themselvs pose as public benefactors. It bribes men to forsake principle for profit, and through greed of gain to support the enrichment of a few at the expense of the many.

14. Protection by its artificial methods creates an unnatural condition of industry, which can never be remedied without serious ills. To withdraw the bolstering support causes distress, and is a seeming injustice to those who hav been induced to engage in such industries. It is an evil that never cures itself; and the remedies are dreaded as worse than the disease by many who suffer indirectly in the process of readjustment.

These are some of the main charges against protection, and may be summed up in the assertion that protection is a violation of natural law, an opposition to those beneficent principles that govern the operations of nature.

Nothing is more bewildering than the attempt to argue upon the merits of free trade or protection from the evidence of facts and figures. Each side can prove its case to a demonstration, if its methods are admitted. Mr. Gladstone shows the growth of English manufactures under free trade, and Mr. Morrill shows the growth of American industries under protection. But the difficulty in these cases is the same that prevails in medicin; it is impossible to prove that the patient would not hav recovered if he had not seen the doctor. The difficulty of searching out the intricate causes of commercial changes prevents the right application of facts. This difficulty of reasoning from statistics and the impossibility of always tracing cause and effect accurately in the wide ramifications of trade, and thus disproving protectionist arguments drawn from apparent benefits, make clear the desirability of going back to first principles and basing our position upon fundamental, undeniable laws of nature.

Let it be shown that free trade is best for the individual, then explain that nations are only aggregations of individuals, and it follows that what is good for a man is good for a nation. If it is profitable for a man to buy his supplies where he can get them cheapest, it is best for a nation to do the same. If, as Bastiat says, "It is best to buy from others what we ourselvs can produce only at a higher price," the rule is not affected by the extent of its application. It affects one man or a million in the same way. Bastiat well illustrates this principle in its simplest form by his description of Robinson Crusoe kicking out to sea a floating plank, a free import, because he should lose fifteen days' labor hewing one from a tree if he allowed the importation. Also by his account of Robinson's refusal to sell to a neighboring islander three hours' work's worth of vegetables for game that it would cost him six hours' work to procure, lest the hunting industry of his island should become extinct. Friday's plea that they could do "something else" with the time saved is the grand solution of all the difficulties supposed to exist with free trade.

The plea for protection is the same that is used against the introduction of labor-saving machinery. The promotion or maintenance of obstacles benefits a few to the disadvantage of many. But as labor-saving machinery tends to create labor, by the cheapening of products and consequent increase of consumption, so freedom in trade enlarges the markets, promotes the inventions and stimulates the energies and enterprise of men. Men's wants are unlimited, and new demands arise as soon as there is a surplus saved by the cheapening of one article.

But in argument with protectionists there are some admissions that we should be prepared to make. The increase of immediate prosperity in some directions as a result of protection must be admitted. Some industries are fostered that otherwise could not exist, and giving to a manufacturer the whole of a market or a larger field enables him to manufacture more cheaply. Thus, in some cases, protection really lowers prices. Especially is this the ultimate result when competition has been aroused, the home market is glutted, and goods cannot be exported to compete with the manufactures of free trade countries. (But protection then fails to protect.) Cities usually grow under protection; some men become very rich; there is a "hum" and a "boom" in some trades for a while. All this must be confessed. It must also be said that depressions come to all trades and all lands—free trade or protectionist. The law of supply and demand causes alternate periods of prosperity and adversity, and all that can be charged is that they come oftener and more severely to the protected country. Wages rise or are depressed under each system; for, as the French say, "when two workmen run after one master wages are low, and when two masters run after one workman wages are high."

But these admissions are to be qualified with other considerations. It would indeed be a pity if protection did no good to offset the large amount of harm it occasions. This little good is concentrated and tangible; but the evil effects are wide-spread, and often too obscure or subdivided to be impressiv. One can see the print factory that employs three hundred hands, but does not notice the million women who pay an extra cent per yard for their print dresses to support this home industry. The coal mine in Nova Scotia attracts attention, but the $321,000 paid in a year in Ontario as duty on bituminous coal is so scattered that the tax is not realized, though its injury and injustice are real. Flour mills make a "hum" that excites admiration, but the homes of all Canada pay extra for the music.

Then, there is no end to the protecting business. The farmer gets protection for his wheat; of course, the miller must hav a corresponding duty put on flour; the miner rebels against the food tax unless his coal is protected; as food and coal are taxed, the iron-worker must hav his share of protection; he is followed by the paper-maker, the cotton-spinner, the wool-weaver, the sugar-refiner, the wood-worker, and every petty "ax-grinder" follows in the clamorous train. The salaried men and wage-workers demand increased pay to meet the advanced cost of living, and if all were served as they consistently should be, the ridiculous spectacle would be presented of a nation trying to make itself rich by paying extra prices all round. How much better to avoid all this intricate, artificial, unnatural effort, and allow common sense, simple justice, and natural rights to regulate our affairs!

What makes a nation prosperous? Is it having a surplus in its treasury gained by taxes? Is it having a large population? Is it having large cities filled with poorly paid and ignorant laborers, and adorned with the palaces of protected capitalists? Or does the prosperity of a country mean the average prosperity of its people? Surely, the latter; where the people are well-to-do, there is a truly prosperous country, and a free trader maintains that a man is most well-to-do where he can buy his supplies cheapest, and use his labor most in accord with the natural fitness of his place and capacity.

Protectionists are accustomed to say, Free trade is all right in theory, but it will not do in practice. In saying this they yield up the whole dispute. What is theory but the law for practice? No theory is right if it does not succeed in practice. Some important point has been overlooked if the principles are not effectiv. The theorists of the world are almost wholly on the side of free trade, and if free trade is right in theory, not only must its practice be best but its obstruction is sinful. Free trade is the application of the Golden Rule to commerce. In morals, all profess to believe in this law, which Confucius (500 B.C.) styled "reciprocity." They say it is perfect in theory; yet how few practice it! A short-sighted selfishness which does not look beyond immediate results leads each to love himself better than his neighbor, and to do unto others only that which would be of no benefit to himself.

When men become more far-seeing they will find that reciprocity, like honesty, is the best policy, and the mistaken self-interest, which now leads to selfish aggrandizement and seclusion, will find its prizes in free intercourse, "giv and take," "liv and let liv," and in the recognition of the brotherhood of man.

Education, then, is the foe of protection and the hope of free trade. Men must be taught the principles of natural law and be trained to trace results accurately to their far-off and intricate conclusions. In the progress of enlightened public opinion lies the hope of the redemption of trade from slavery.

To the Liberal Public.

There is a demand among our Liberal people for a book of songs and tunes that shall be entirely free from theological objections. There is no such book to-day in the market. We want to sing truth, not falsehood. It is time that the dead words of Christian theology should be dropped from the lips of song. Such names and words as God, Jesus, Christ, Holy Spirit, Satan, savior, heaven, hell, angel, etc., should no longer be sung. They are not words that stand for facts, nor do they express sentiments that make men and women truer, nobler, or better. They lack significance. They are only the flowers of superstition.

What we need are songs of humanity, of human love, human hope, human toil, and human needs. We want songs of patriotism, songs of freedom, songs of home, songs of joy. The moral aspirations of the world must be set to music, and the lips sing what the hands, head, and heart are striving to realize.

We hav many good songs, or hymns, as they are called, that can be used in such a work as I hav intimated. I believe that a book of sensible music can be compiled for use in our Liberal meetings. I want to ask everyone interested in our cause to giv this matter his earnest attention.

What I propose is this: That a book of words and tunes be published that shall contain appropriate sentiments for public meetings, funerals, etc., and I would request all who hav songs of Liberal sentiments to furnish me with copies of the same, or inform me where they may be obtained. I would also like to hav original words and music.

Any information that will assist me in carrying out this project will be thankfully received. Address,

Revere, Mass. L. K. WASHBURN.

A SMALL-SIZED Talmage of Brooklyn is entitled to recognition. A Sunday or two ago his subject was "Heaven." "The nearer we get to heaven," he said, "the happier we are. For example, take the beasts of the field, who crawl and creep and wander through jungles from their prey. They eat on earth, liv on earth, and belong to earth altogether. They are miserable. But take the birds of the air that fly above the earth and fill the atmosphere with beautiful song—they are happy." In uniqueness of argument this preacher is away up toward the head of the procession. Following the same train of logic, the man who goes up in a balloon a mile or two ought to experience transports of joy but little short of paradise.

Official Call for Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Local Secular Unions, Life, Charter, and Annual Members, and all Liberal citizens who support the Nine Demands of Secularism, Greeting:

You are hereby invited to attend the Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, which will convene at Lafayette Hall, Wood street, near 4th, Pittsburgh, Pa., Friday, October 5, 1888, at 10 A.M., for a four days' session—5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th inclusiv.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State or Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Unions are entitled to seats and votes in this Annual Congress. Each Local Secular Union is entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates. Annual Members who pay or hav paid $1 in the national treasury are entitled to seats, but not to votes, except by unanimous consent of the Congress.

This Congress will specially consider practical questions tending to further agitation for taxation of church property; the abrogation of state aid to sectarian institutions; abolition of state, national, military, and prison chaplaincies; repeal of judicial oaths, Sunday and other oppressiv and unjust ecclesiastical laws; nullification of attempts to subvert our Constitution by a legal recognition of Theism in the American Magna Charta, and such other measures as will not merely thwart intended theological encroachments, but will absolutely expunge from our laws, state and federal, such insidious acts as hav already crept in to blot out mental freedom from our republic.

It is to be hoped that the addresses delivered will deal with the practical issues of the organization, so that there will be such an awakening of the people to these vital questions of the hour that a revival of the instinct of liberty and justice for all will necessarily result; that again from the Keystone state—the birthplace of our association—the clarion voice of freedom shall vibrate throughout the land.

Pittsburgh being situated almost in the center of a district containing many of our most distinguished workers, thinkers, and writers, besides the activ host within its limits, there is little doubt but that this Congress will be a glorious gathering of the forces who stand for mental liberty, as expressed in the desire for complete Secularization of the government.

Conundrums for Ministerial Meddlers.

Saturday last the public service committee of the county board were besieged by a delegation headed by reverend reformers who propose to manage matters for the public. They remonstrated against the issuance of a license to Mr. Edmonson, a Chicago oyster merchant, who owns the pleasure-grounds in the town of Palos known as Willow Springs—grounds of sufficiently good reputation to be frequently used for the accommodation of city Sunday-school picnics. The townspeople had favored the license by a vote of 142 to 34, but the commissioners had withheld it to hear evidence on grave charges made as to the immoral character of the place. A remonstrance—by all custom, supposed to be signed only by property-holders and legal voters—was largely signed, but it leaked out that Rev. Mr. Grumbler had circulated it in church and all the Sunday-school children had signed, besides having circulated it in all the adjoining towns. Had such a fraud been perpetrated by Mr. Edmonson, what a howl of righteous indignation would hav been heard! Failing in that, these sanctified representativs of morals attempted to slander Willow Springs out of existence. They claimed it was a resort of low men and lewd women; it defiled the atmosphere of Cook county; its drunken orgies were a disgrace, and they exhausted the vocabulary of invectivs in describing its horrors. One veracious gentleman, Rev. Mr. Judkins, solemnly affirmed that men and women cohabited there in the most outrageous and public manner. This was news to the public.

Our old friend Commissioner Williams questioned as to when they witnessed these fearful improprieties. Oh, no, they did not witness them; they had never been inside the grounds, but they knew some one who had.

The committee insisted on names of persons who could substantiate these charges.

They were suddenly afflicted by chronic forgetfulness—ah, they, ah, could not, ah, just then, on the spur of the moment, remember their names. Failing to confirm a single assertion, they then begged merely to close the grounds on Sunday.

The jolly commissioner concluded to giv these ministers a lesson in moral reform, and he gave them solid chunks of advice in regard to telling the truth at all times. He further said that he was certain that lewd practices could be proved to hav occurred in some of the churches, and asked Brother Jenkins if he thought that wasn't a fair argument in favor of their suppression. A "midnight on the sea" sort of a frown overspread the reverend's face, and if our adipose commissioner is reëlected it will not be by votes of that minister's congregation, by a large majority. The board hav taken the matter under advisement.

A GRAND ACHIEVEMENT.

Wettstein's Freethought emblem is conspicuous on a poster we hav received informing us that the sturdy Secularists of Silverton, Ore., who set such a glorious example to the whole country by building a Freethought hall exclusivly for their uses one year ago, will celebrate the anniversary of its dedication June 23d, at which President Putnam delivers the oration, and the occasion will doubtless inspire his poetic fervor for one of his most brilliant efforts. A basket picnic will be held in the city park, and speeches by J. T. McCleary, J. T. Ford, and C. Beal, while recitations and singing by the home talent will be sandwiched between the lunch and the brass band. The day's festivities to conclude with a grand ball in Freethought Hall. Distance does not lend enchantment on this occasion, for we cannot refrain from groaning,

Oh, what must it be to be there!

It is bound to be a success—a lady is at the head of the committee—Mrs. Carrie Fitzgerell, H. D. Mount, and E. Walford. But we must leave the land of promis—the West—to contemplate the degrading superstitions which still infest the East.

IS THIS OUR BOASTED PROGRESS?

This morning's News contains a lengthy "special" dispatch from Pittsburgh, where yesterday (June 13th) was celebrated the feast of St. Anthony (not Tony of the S. S. V.) at the church of the most holy name. For days pilgrims hav arrived from distant points of a dozen states, and, as less than a third could gain admission, Troy Hill was packed with men, women, and children, standing for hours with uncovered heads in the hot sun until Father Mollinger appeared on the steps to bless the multitude. As this is supposed to be specially beneficial to the sick, many were carried in arms or brought in chairs. "The most noticeable cure," says the dispatch, "was that of Miss Anna Kirk, of Philadelphia, who had suffered for five years with hip disease. After the solemn ceremonies she threw away her crutches and walked without difficulty." Oremus! All who are not cured are invited to remain till they are, and it appears Mollinger is "in" with the boarding-house interests in the neighborhood of his church.

Americans hav pretended that this Romish superstition could never take root on our soil. What are the facts? By low deceit and cunning it as effectually chains the intellect and obstructs human progress as when it bartered thrones and dictated Europe by its bulls, except as all hav had some help from the general intellectual growth. It no longer keeps a naked emperor shivering at its gates, but it compels the president and cabinet of the freest government on earth to lend their presence at the laying of a corner-stone of an institution which each knows full well will be utilized to train traitors to American principles. If Cleveland wants the Catholic vote he must assist in Rome's latest move—representation of the Vatican at the White House. That's not much to accommodate his "dear friend" Cardinal Gibbons. A few years ago a president would hav been regarded with suspicion who made so much of Rome's chief spy.

POISONING CHILDREN TO SAVE THEIR SOULS.

According to Christianity the mortal is of little consequence compared with the immortal part. A double (and perhaps triple) murder is clearly traceable to that idea, and has set the Quaker City aghast. Sarah J. Whiteling has just confessed to furnishing her husband with poison with which to end his life last March, and to poisoning her nine-year-old daughter in April, and her two-year-old Willie in May. She says: "I killed Bertie because I was afraid she would grow up in sin and crime; she was a bad girl; had stolen pennies from the neighbors, and once from her teacher's pocket-book. I killed Willie because he was in the way. I am sorry for what I hav done and want the people to pray for me." With Christian cupidity she had secured some insurance on each of her victims and collected it. She professed great piety, attended church in her neighborhood last Sunday, and kneeling at the altar asked for the prayers of the congregation. This wretched woman's crime and conduct is a direct answer to the church's claim that religion and morality are one. Is it not time for humanity to protest against the immoral tone of a creed whose tendency is to sacrifice the body to save the soul? If you think so, help the American Secular Union to brush away ecclesiastical cobwebs.

PRESBYTERIANS SECEDE AT PITTSBURGH.

To those who thought secession had been effectually checked by the "late unpleasantness," the action of the general synod of the Reformed Presbyterian church will come with the warlike crash of cannon on Fort Sumter. They hav virtually "fired" the United States Constitution, and emphatically declared that "immortal document" to be N. G., as it does not recognize Christ or the Christian religion, therefore loyalty to the Constitution is disloyalty to Christ. They hav concluded Christ can't stand it any longer, and hav given the United States notice to quit. Their dictum is, that hereafter they will not perform any act which implies allegiance to the nation as long as the government is neutral to the claims of "Christ as the king of nations." That will do till the tax-collector comes round. They also propose to boycott all other churches who permit their members to become good citizens. "Here is a how-d'ye-do! Here's a pretty mess!" No presidential dark horses from religious rebels of the Reformed Presbyterian stripe. They indorsed Prohibition (which is a process to be obtained by law, but ministers are never expected to be logical), denounced tobacco, secret societies, Sunday papers, and propose to boycott all members who advertise in the same. Our dictatorial dead-heads hav become so refreshingly modest, as it were, that we suggest that the attorney-general of the United States confiscate the property of traitors in "open rebellion" to the basic principle of our government, the Constitution.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

Severe sickness prevented me from sooner sending in my report. I hav had two relapses, but hope to avoid the "three times and out."

Clark Braden, keeping hid till the last moment, occasioned me much trouble. I had canceled appointments, expecting to go to Phenix, Ariz., to hold a discussion with some theological giant, who, to quote the letter of the church folks urging me to come, "was a courteous gentleman and a minister in good standing in his own denomination." Braden was well aware that if it became known that the Christians of Phenix had been beguiled into accepting him as their champion, an exposure of his record would be made that would defeat his scheme to obtain their shekels. He cunningly, under various false pretexts, induced church folks to hold back his name. The Liberals made the discovery only at the last moment; their telegram reached me only on Friday afternoon, as I was preparing to start for Phenix early Saturday morning.

This disreputable impostor should be thoroughly exposed. It is too bad that even the orthodox should be victimized by such a contemptible fraud. He delivered seventeen lectures at Phenix, for which the bigoted church folks had to pay. The more intelligent and the general public expressed contemptuous indifference, declining to attend. This so infuriated Clark Braden that on leaving the city he indulged in a characteristic tirade of mendacity and billingsgate, which he published in the local press, and thus relieved the Liberals of the duty of thoroughly exposing the blackguard. He gave himself away.

While in Phenix, I am informed, he repeatedly boasted, and published in the Phenix Herald, that he was so able a debater and defender of the Christian faith that he had driven the chief Liberal lecturers from the field. Phew! how his dear friends Crazy Comstock and Snarleyow Nym Crinkle must hav foamed with rage and envy to find themselvs so far distanced in audacious mendacity, the one quality they hav devoted the best efforts of their lives to excel in! It will be too bad if it breaks up their friendship. Braden, Comstock, Crinkle—the supreme trinity of malicious mendacity—three of a kind.

SAN DIEGO, April 29th.—I telegraphed to San Diego, and lectured there on Sunday evening. I arrived in time to bid farewell to a large number of the leading workers of the San Diego Spiritualistic Liberal Society, who sailed on Sunday afternoon, via the Santa Rosa, for San Francisco and points north—a sad loss to the Liberal cause at San Diego.

Monday morning I engaged passage on the steamship Queen, and ten minutes later a telegram was received that she had sunk off Port Harford. I had to wait till Thursday, May 3d, for the Santa Rosa, when for the first time I sailed on the Pacific ocean.

Desirous to reach Salinas on time, as I had a regular engagement to lecture there May 8th, 9th, and 10th, I decided to take the overland route from Port Harford to Salinas—stage and rail. Let all travelers carefully avoid so doing. The stage route is wretched; no connections; charges extortionate. It is a hundred per cent cheaper, quicker, and more comfortable to continue on the steamship to San Francisco, and take rail back to Salinas.

I arrived at Salinas on Monday. No arrangements had been made for lectures. Mysterious, subtle, adverse influences were at work. The person I had corresponded and made engagement with hid away. I remained till next evening; finding no possibility of lectures, I took the train for Monterey.

MONTEREY, May 9th, 10th, and 11th.—I found Austin Smith, a noble veteran, a generous, kindly, outspoken, independent Infidel, and stanch and true worker for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I had not half enumerated my disappointments and vexations, when he hurried me off to supper, and far more quickly than I could dispose of the viands he cleared away all discouragements and inspired me with renewed hope and courage. In the morning we engaged a hall, got out handbills, etc. I delivered three lectures at the new Opera House, the proprietor of which is a public spirited, intelligent gentleman, who became an earnest investigator, and beyond doubt will prove an efficient worker for Liberalism. This was one of the many good results of the lectures. The first evening's attendance was slim, but each succeeding night it increased, and the interest was excellent.

Here dwells Capt. Thomas Lambert, who, tired of the arduous responsibilities of command afloat, has settled on this shore, and is conducting an extensiv lumber business. A genuin Liberal, with all a sailor's hearty, honest thoroughness, he told me of his many years at sea. He has several times sailed round the world, and he declares it is a beautiful world, despite "the curse;" full of good folks, notwithstanding the church's claim of man's "total depravity." It is a very joy to be in the company of such a man. He loves to dwell on the roseate side of things; he has all his life cared only to remember the good he found in people; he readily finds excuses for their shortcomings; and although he will not palliate or sanction wrong, his kindly heart pities the wrong-doer, and he prefers to expatiate on some redeeming quality of the culprit as an offset to the evil. A typical Liberal; a brave, honest sailor, nearing the end of life's voyage, with a clean log-book and every duty of life fearlessly, faithfully performed.

Monterey is a queer old Spanish town, once an old whaling station. On the shore I saw old mammoth iron kettles in which in days of yore they boiled the blubber of the captured Jonah fish.

Monterey is two-thirds Spanish and seven-tenths Roman Catholic, but the spirit of the age and American enterprise are fast redeeming the town, and today it is a safe place to invest in real estate and await the boom—sure advance in value. With the constant influx of intelligent Americans, Liberalism is sure to continue its grand onward march.

May 10th.—Friend Austin Smith took me for a carriage ride, the most interesting I ever enjoyed—seventeen miles of smooth road, every rod of it a delight, now along long groves of firs, now in the depths of forests of cypress and pine, now on the seashore. At one point I looked out to sea, and on the rugged ledge of rocks some three hundred yards from shore I saw hundreds and hundreds of seals (sea lions) flopping in and out of the water, barking and yelping as they awkwardly climbed with their two flippers—their only means of propulsion—up and down the steep rocks, or lay basking in the sunshine. Hundreds were as large as young cows. While wet they look quite black, but dried in the sun they become a light brown color. Immense flocks of sea gulls made their home on top of the same rocks, and dwelt in amity with the seals—at least, neither seemed to disturb the other.

I got out of the carriage and stood on a projecting point of rock; between me and the rocky playground of the seals I saw a school of some half-dozen porpoises, from the monster parents to the little young ones all sporting in the waves. To my left was the wondrous ancient evergreen cypress forest; straight before me I saw two full-rigged ships, all sail set, en route to China; just at the edge of the great circle of vision, where sea and sky commingle, was the smoke of a huge steamship. And as I stood there I realized I had complied with the kindly advice of ye gentle, youthful sage, ye Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, "Go West, old man, go West!" I could go West no farther. I had reached the jumping-off place. Thousands of miles from home and loved ones, despite the bright sunshine, the life-imparting ozone wafted from the ocean, the glorious beauty and novelty of the scene, my heart grew sad. I was, oh, so lonely! How I longed for the sight of eyes that always brighten at my approach; for the sound of voices that ever thrill with tenderness and love when addressing me! What are all the beauties of earth unless shared by those that love us? A whole year yet ere I can hope to greet my loved ones. I well know it is indeed a noble and glorious work in which I am engaged; my success should fill me with courage, and make my heart overflow with joy and gladness. Yes; but there will at times come dark clouds in the brightest skies.

My brief fit of melancholy was dispelled by the genial voice of friend Austin Smith, who had remained in the carriage, shouting to me: "Come, old fellow, life's too short for dreaming. We must keep moving."

DEL MONTE.—The next day we visited Del Monte, about a mile from Monterey. This place is far, far beyond the power of adjectivs to do it justice. It is the realization of romantic fancy's brightest, most beauteous fairyland. An immense park of noble old trees of all kinds—grand, stately, old monarchs of the forest; long groves of firs on each side of broad, smooth drives; the broadest, brightest, greenest lawns; gorgeous mammoth flowers in richest profusion of every shape and color; flower-beds of most tasteful designs; croquet grounds smooth as if formed of one great dark marble slab; lawn tennis—the grounds inclosed with trellis-work over which vines of various kinds grow, bearing wondrous profusion of flowers of brightest hues; a Fair Rosamond maze where many spend hours in vain endeavor to reach the center; a fairy lake of goodly dimensions, with gondoliers in which happy young lovers enjoy sweet converse while sailing on its smooth waters; bath-house, the most perfect conceivable, the sea water regulated to any temperature desired in the great swimming-baths; the hotel itself a monster fairy palace, furnished with oriental magnificence; the health-imparting breeze from the ocean; the murmur of the tide upon the shore; the glorious, bright sky; the perfume and glorious beauty of the flowers—in such a place one needs but the presence of dear loved ones to realize the most perfect heaven mind can conceive. To visit Del Monte in May or June when it is arrayed in all its floral magnificence well repays the journey from New York and back.

From this true, real heaven I rejoice to be able to send glad tidings to all interested in human progress.

From New York to the shores of the Pacific ocean, at nearly every place I hav lectured, I hav found noble, brave, honest hearts, faithful co-workers for the cause of universal mental liberty—Infidel men and women, old and young, who, joyously, self-sacrificingly, labor for the welfare of their fellow-creatures, finding their greatest happiness in promoting that of others. And in every place I find the people more desirous to hear and investigate than the Liberal friends supposed. I hav the encouraging assurance that the lectures I hav delivered hav given many recruits to the grand army of truth seekers. The sale of Liberal books and pamphlets has greatly helped the spirit of investigation, and the new subscribers obtained for Liberal papers insure continuance of the good work.

Now, dear reader—you believe in Liberalism, in promoting the happiness of others—here and just now is an excellent opportunity to practically prove the reality of your Liberalism. Make one, just one, real, earnest, persistent effort to procure one new subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. You will thus cheer the editor, promote the happiness of the publisher, do real good to the subscriber so obtained and his family, and to friends, and make glad your own heart, knowing you hav not lived altogether in vain, but that some will liv more benevolent, useful, and consequently happier lives from reading the good words of THE TRUTH SEEKER—a joy they might never hav known but for your earnest endeavor to bring its great worth to their attention. If every reader will only secure one new subscriber, the impetus to the cause we love will be glorious. Let us make a good try.

Psychological Heredity.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Your readers are undoubtedly aware that an Anthropological Congress assembled in New York the early part of this month. I wish to call special attention to the paper presented by Dr. T. D. Crothers, of Hartford, on "Psychological Heredity." "The mental and moral traits of persons," he says, "are seen in the fixed ideas of individuals and communities. We may conclude that many fixed ideas of religion, science, politics, and life are generally traceable to heredity. The intellectual and moral attainments of many communities," he remarks, "are largely the result of the heredity of certain dominant ideas of past generations. Some reforms," he further tells us, "are of such slow growth that, unless by some great social revolution, generations supervene before any reform attains permanency. Psychological heredity," he thinks, "brings out a new view of the origin and growth of the intellectual and moral progress of men and nations;" and, finally, he says, "fixed ideas of religion and science are often defended with a childish dogma below the intellectual standard of the defenders." (Vide Gladstone.) I presume you and many of your readers hav often been surprised to meet men and women well informed on almost every subject who are still a hundred years behind the times, if not indeed a thousand, in regard to the origin of man and the actual uncertainty of his destiny. Through psychological heredity, the superstitions of the Middle Ages remain in possession of their brain. It is therefore surprising that the Liberal movement makes as much progress as it really does. We should indeed hav patience with those who seem to cling tenaciously to the account of the origin of man as given in the book of Genesis. They are no more to blame for it than they are for having blue or black eyes, or for having possibly a hare-lip, or a club-foot, or a birthmark of some kind.

The Mission of Liberalism.

Christianity has taught to do no wrong because God is angry with the sinner and would endanger the soul's salvation, and yet held up for the adoration of a credulous people a God guilty of sanctioning and commanding the greatest crimes which man could possibly commit.

Though Christianity teaches that God will in no way spare the guilty, yet there is offered a broad avenue of escape. There is offered salvation, an eternity of bliss, to the vilest of criminals through the atoning blood of Christ; between the last vile crime and the last breath, by repenting and asking the forgivness of an infinit being whom we can in no way injure, he can be rewarded with a life of never-ending joy in a "world to come." For we know

> There is a fountain filled with blood
> Drawn from Immanuel's veins,
> And sinners plunged beneath that flood
> Lose all their guilty stains.

Can such teachings hav any other than a pernicious influence? Does the hope of forgivness ever prevent the commission of a crime? Could such dogmas hav any other effect than to induce people to follow the lowest and most selfish propensities of their natures? I omit the long and ghastly narration of the follies and crimes of mankind under church domination—let the record of our penal institutions giv the answer. The doctrin of the atonement is but an asylum for the weak and a refuge for hypocrits and knaves.

But Liberalism teaches that there never has been, and never can be, any sacrifice on the part of any God for the sins of mankind; that there has never been any atonement for man's salvation; that there has been no need of any, for man was never lost; that there is no being upon whom we can cast our follies and vices; that each individual must bear the consequences of his own acts, and we must reap as we sow. There are no rewards or punishments in nature, but there are results—consequences. If we put our hand into the fire, it must smart as a result of our act, and not the hand of another. If we eat and drink inordinately, we suffer in consequence; a law of nature has been violated, and we cannot look to the clouds for relief, or cast our sin of gluttony upon a crucified savior. Liberalism teaches us to liv temperately and chastely, not by reason that "no drunkard shall enter the kingdom of heaven," or because "Thou shalt not commit adultery" is found in holy writ, but because by indulging these vices, instead of contributing to the happiness of the world, we make ourselvs and others miserable and unhappy and entail endless suffering upon the human race.

Christianity has taught that the "father of mercies" is the dispenser of all "temporal blessings;" that we are dependent upon him for health, food, raiment, wealth. Christianity has taught man to turn imploringly to high heaven for relief—to ask in faith and receive accordingly. Liberalism teaches man to expect nothing from the skies; that industry is the only prayer answered; that one world at a time is enough to look after, and to make the best of this life. Liberalism teaches that if the hungry are to be fed, man must feed them; if the naked are to be clothed, man must clothe them; if the sick are to be relieved, man must minister unto them.

The church has great sympathy for the "benighted heathen," but has little feeling for the poor, ignorant, and degraded at home. The church begs promiscuously of rich and poor for funds to send missionaries among the savages to preach the gospel of glad tidings—to giv them the blessed assurance that all their ancestors who never heard, and all of themselvs who do hear but reject, the missionaries' teachings are sure to go to hell. The church rises in righteous indignation over the polygamous practices of some oriental people, and yet holds up incestuous and polygamous Bible characters as examples for us—as "men after God's own heart." Great concern is felt about the Mormons, but little do we hear said about the polyandrous practices in Christian cities.

Christianity organizes benevolent institutions on an extensiv scale. Her philanthropy is so lofty and far-reaching that there is no sympathy for man but in the aggregate. The individual atom is beneath her notice.

In our large cities thousands of people are suffering for the ordinary decencies and even necessaries of life, many of them under the shadow of the churches, but by them the wealthy and aristocratic Christian passes in scorn. The directors and officers of these organized Christian charities are so finical that a visit to a hovel where a poverty-stricken family manages to eke out a miserable existence would not be "respectable," so, instead of helping them to find work or ministering to their wants, instead of giving them a barrel of flour, they send a few religious tracts. If a hungry, dirty beggar asks alms, he is called a tramp and exhorted to repent. It is a very easy thing for one who is well fed, well clothed, who has everything that wealth can procure, to talk about the goodness and mercy of omnipotence, but to the man who is hungry and naked, and what is more, whose wife of his bosom and children of his heart are destitute, ragged, pinched by the cold, their haggard, pitiful looks showing that the hungry wolf of famin is gnawing at their vitals—to talk of God's goodness to such a one is hollow mockery. Quoting scripture to people in that condition does not relieve them of their wants, and a sermon will not show them where or how to earn an honest livelihood.

Liberalism does not organize extensiv charities by whom no one is benefited but the managers, but teaches to help the individual sufferer. The difference between Christian and Liberal charity consists in this: Christianity teaches that we must prepare for another world; Liberalism teaches how to liv for this life, to beautify this world. Christian philanthropy has feeling for man only in the aggregate; Liberal benevolence assists the individual. Liberalism teaches if one who is needy and deserving asks alms to reach for our pocketbook instead of quoting a maxim. If a neighbor's family is suffering for food, bread and meat will do more good than a wagon-load of pamphlets.

Liberalism must insist and demand that every person shall hav the fruits of his own toil, a just reward for the products of his labor; that the laborer shall hav fewer hours to work, and more hours for recreation and culture. Then there will be no need for extensiv charitable institutions, little need of almsgiving. Each individual will then share in the wealth of the world according to his ability to produce; property will be more equally distributed; then will most of the drunkenness, prostitution, and many other vices born of ignorance and poverty be banished from the world.

Christian morality teaches that many of the pleasures and enjoyments of life which are of themselvs innocent are wrong because to be cheerful, joyous—to make this life pleasant—is inconsistent with deductions drawn from the teachings of the nature-hating Galilean ascetic. Liberalism teaches that all recreations, all pleasures, not in themselvs harmful, are right and beneficial. Some Christians think that eating meat on certain days of the week, or during Lent, is a sin. Common sense laughs at such folly. Christianity says dancing is wrong because such gayety is inconsistent with a holy life. Liberalism says to dance moderately, if we so desire, as it will giv grace and beauty to our movements, strengthen our limbs, and improve our digestion.

Christianity says there is one day of the week too holy to be used for secular pursuits or for the recreation and pleasure of man; that this day must be given up to the worship of God. Liberalism teaches that there is no one day of the week better than another, nor none too good to be devoted to the service of man; that man should hav one day of the week to be released from the burdens of life, in which he may seek those enjoyments and pleasures that are consistent with the rights of others; that he shall hav the right to engage in such pleasures as will contribute to his physical, mental, and social culture.

Christianity wants to enforce her doctrins by force of statute law, with the hope of drawing people to the churches by forbidding their going elsewhere. Liberalism wants the laws so adjusted that each individual may be free to do as he chooses. We want those who wish to go to church and listen to the reading of impossible tales and nonsensical discourses to hav the right and be protected in that right. We also insist that if we wish to go on excursions to the hills and groves where we can commune with Mother Nature; to the museums or parks; to go to the theater, where human nature is represented in all its manifoldness, where right and truth are represented as triumphing over might and wrong; or to the opera and listen to the soul-thrilling symphonies of a Wagner, we hav the right to do so, and should be protected in that right.

We want a day of rest, a day to be released from toil, and are willing that that day should be the one observed by the people generally. But we wish to make our day of rest a holiday, make it joyous and lively—a day in which to "chase dull care away." We want to make that day one solely for the benefit of man; but for those who wish to devote that time to the worship of an almighty humbug in the clouds, let them do so.

One great difficulty with the world is that Christianity has preached into man the belief that he is a miserable sinner, a depraved and fallen being, only fit to be damned. We hav had too many sermons about the sins and shortcomings of man, and not enough about his virtues and noble deeds. Christians hav endeavored to improve the world by too much talking and too little doing. Morality has been taught too much by precept and too little by practice. Those who hav had much to do with the government of children will, I think, agree with me that it is a useless waste of words to be continually lecturing them on good behavior. Some little incident, told at proper times, in which some one's rights hav been grossly outraged, will hav more influence for good than a thousand homilies on morality. Why will not the same methods do more good with grown children who need support and guidance? Why not convert the church into a theater and the pulpit into a stage?

The most effectiv discourses, stories, dramas, are those written for the sake of art, the true and the beautiful, without any particular regard for so-called moral culture. From which will we most learn to hate ingratitude, a sermon on original sin or "King Lear?" From which will we most learn to hate greed, avarice, injustice, and to love to see justice triumph—sermons on repentance, justification by faith, foreordination and predestination, or "The Merchant of Venice?"

The sculptor has no other end in view than the attainment of the beautiful when, with his mallet and chisel, he carves from the rough stone a human figure in all its symmetry and beauty, but no one can gaze upon that graven image, that forbidden work of art, without being impressed with the sacredness of the human form divine. The stars preach no morality, yet the study of astronomy will do more to enlarge and ennoble the mind of man than all the sermons that were ever preached. Our woodland warblers carol forth no songs of repentance or morality, yet every song of theirs, every note that bursts upon the summer air, has an elevating and refining influence.

A tree must be judged by its fruit; a system of philosophy or religion must be judged by its results. The history of Christianity proves that as a moral factor it has signally failed. In the constructiv work of the future the old theologies can play no part. They hav no doubt done some little good in their day, but their system of ethics being based upon wrong principles, their effects must in the end be pernicious.

Will Liberalism produce better results than Christianity? is now the question. I may be over-sanguin in believing that it will, but its principles are founded on more correct views of human life, and its teachings must therefore strike a responsiv chord in every human heart. Christianity has ever taught the depravity and wickedness of man, and in answer as to what has been the effect our criminal calendar responds.

Liberalism teaches that it is a grand and noble thing to be a man; that the element of goodness predominates; that man is by no means depraved; that he has risen from low and savage states to what he is now; that he is constantly growing in intelligence and virtue. What the result of such teachings will be, posterity must reply.

Christianity has endeavored to unify the human race by fire and sword; has tried to force all nations and all races into one common fold, to embrace one creed and be of one faith. Liberalism expects to unify the human race, not by trying to force all the people to think alike, or embrace any particular faith—knowing that in the manifoldness of human nature and the evolution of ideas this is neither possible nor desirable, for it is in the clash of opinions that truth is evolved—but by complete toleration, by removing race prejudices, breaking down the spirit of caste, destroying national jealousies and sectarian strifes. Liberalism teaches us the noble precept: "The world is my country, to do good my religion." Liberalism must insist that all disputes be settled by arbitration instead of war and law, and work, through all the conflicting interests of commerce, and in spite of the diversity of beliefs, to unify the human race, to unite mankind in one common brotherhood in the bonds of humanity and love.

Methinks I see a glorious future for Liberalism. Away in the horizon of the years to come methinks I see the hosts of Freedom rising for final victory. Methinks I hear the murmur of happy voices, voices like the sounds of many waters, proclaiming "liberty throughout all the land and to all the inhabitants thereof." Methinks I see inscribed upon their banners these glorious words: Humanity, justice, love. Methinks I see the time when truth shall hold the scales of justice; when the strong shall no longer tyrannize over the weak; when the rich will no longer conspire to oppress the poor; when the poor will no longer combine to destroy the rich; when each one shall receive the just rewards of his labor; when the crimes and vices, born of poverty, ignorance, and greed, shall no longer be committed.

Methinks I see the time when cathedrals reared in which to perpetuate ignorance and prejudice shall giv place to temples of learning and toleration; when there will be no longer need of bolts and bars; when jails, workhouses, prisons, scaffolds, will exist only on history's page to tell the sad story of a barbarous age; when wars and famins shall no longer blight the earth, and men shall be at peace with all the world; when we shall "love our neighbor as ourselvs."

When, when shall this be? When the hideous superstitions of the night shall hav faded from the minds of men; when churches, with their cruel, cunning priests, shall be no more, and false religions no longer curse the world.

The Inconsistency of Prayer.

The desire for supernatural acquirement is as inconsistent as the idea of perpetual motion. It is like building a tower "whose top should reach unto heaven." For nature being all the universe, including all existence, there can be nothing supernatural. This doctrin of the supernatural is the father, and the child, of all the superstitions of the world.

It is the idea of the supernatural that leads men to pray. They lay down their manliness, and depend upon an imaginary being for the accomplishment of their desires. If there was such a thing as "answer to prayer," there could not remain a solitary question by anyone of its genuin reality. It would be like informing a person that there was such a place as Chicago who had never heard of the city, and if he doubted it, he would be convinced by being taken there, and the fact would no longer be denied. And so it should be with prayer. If a man is right sure that his prayers are answered, let him pray before a multitude, and let them see and hear the answer that God is supposed to make. Ministers are loth to try such experiments. What of it? I say that nothing could be more inconsistent than to believe in answer to prayer without an actual illustration. If it is true it can be demonstrated.

We are asked to accept the Christian faith, not because we hav seen preachers moving mountains, healing the sick, or raising from the dead; not because we hav seen boys and girls grow great in knowledge by eating butter and honey, as the Bible prescribes; we are not asked to believe in this supernatural religion because we hav actually witnessed the performance of any "miracle" that it records, but we are asked to blindfold ourselvs and accept it for no other reason whatever than that our fathers believed it and that we'll be damned if we don't. In the first place, we are asked by these pious monsters to lay down the dignity we rightly should be proud of, and say that we are a "poor lost sinner," and that we are "not fit to liv." Usually this requirement of Christianity attracts such characters as it describes, and catches like a fly-trap all the murderers, thieves, robbers, liars, hangmen, ministers, and circus performers in the country, and they all go together marching on to Zion. Glory be to Gawd! I want better company!

Ministers generally pray for those who get along pretty well anyway, such as the president, congressmen, and all the legislators that are sent to the capital from their particular electoral precinct. And because these national leaders are found pocketing a little government cash occasionally, their prayers are supposed to be answered, on account of their unrivaled success in that direction.

If the Christian religion was true, and if prayers were answered, every man would be a miracle-worker and a God almighty. As a miracle-worker he would paralyze the hand of every assassin, and Garfields and Lincolns would hav lived in health; or, on the other hand, the Christian hangman's noose would be like tender threads, and the intended victim would fall unharmed through the sheriff's trap. The seventy-one convicts in the Anamosa, Iowa, penitentiary would break the iron bars and walk out shouting praises to the Lord. The eighty-two Catholics caged in the same institution would bow again profoundly to the priest, while the one Infidel confined therein would yet be left to shriek in agony until his time is out. If prayer was answered, the candidate for alderman could simply pray for his election, and God would giv him the required majority. Of course, if the other candidate was not a prayerful man, there would not be much use of his entering the campaign. Prayers in such circumstances would probably resemble that of the Kentucky hunter: "God, help me this time; you know I never asked you before, and I won't bother you again. But if you don't help me, for God's sake don't help the other man."

And again: If prayer was answered, mankind would be a great, tremendous, contradicting deity, and it would cause inevitable confusion, so long as the infinit endeavored to obey the commands of the finite. Man would be the ruler of the universe if prayer was answered, and his insignificant plea would guide the planets in their course; and some illiterate crank might possibly obliterate the shining sun forever. If Christianity is true, almighty God would be the humble servant of humanity, wondering to himself which master to obey—a shouting Methodist or a hardshell Baptist.

Then why believe that there exists a ruler of the universe or a special providence? Let us look at it fairly. If there is a god and not a special providence, the sun will shine and rain will fall upon us all alike. And if this god is not a special providence, he cannot manifest himself to man. And if we hav not seen him or traces of his hand, then why assert that there is such a being?

And, on the other hand, if there is a special providence, it would not be much effort on his part to specially provide to convince us of the fact. A special providence would answer prayers. The nations offered up their earnest prayers for James A. Garfield's recovery. He lived in misery and suffered death. "Ah," the Christians say, "God's ways are not our ways." If true, let God alone and never pray to him. If he knows best, he will "do all things well." And if all-wise, he needs no information. If infinitly good, you need not tell him how to do his duty.

Suppose two prayers are offered that conflict? He would be most likely, then, to confine his notice to one denomination at a time. So thus it is that the idea of special providence is proved to be a myth, a superstition. Ministers preach it from their pulpits, but never offer us a single demonstration. There they stand, club-footed posture, toes turned in; their knees slightly bent, as if to sink beneath the burden of their sins; eyes staring at the ceiling, as if to look the deity in the face; hands folded in a deathly attitude—there they stand, the most intolerable monsters of humanity. They represent the age not evoluted to enlightenment.

Now, in conclusion, I will relate a little circumstance in connection with a devout member of the Young Men's Christian Association of Des Moines. It will not be wandering from the subject, for it is supposed to be a positiv proof that God answers prayers, and he told me the story with sincerity, in order that I might receive the benefit of light that God had given him. In our conversation I was told what the Lord had done for him and how many prayers he had answered, etc. I asked him to giv me the particulars in just one instance that his prayers were answered. He proceeded: "I run a dairy. Last summer cream was very scarce, and I had hardly enough to supply my customers, especially on Saturday. Saturday came and it was a very hot day. I knew that the restaurants would want an unusually heavy supply. I prayed to God that something might happen that I could supply the demands. Sure enough, God answered my prayer. One customer sent me word that he didn't want any, and I had three gallons left."

I thought that was rather hard on his business, but he proceeded with another story still more convincing: "And it was the same way almost with milk. I didn't hav enough. What did I do? I prayed to the Lord that he might some way inform me how to fill all the orders."

"And did he inform you?"

"Of course he did—it came to me in a dream. Don't mention it, but I was told to put in a little chalk and water." WARNER LOVELL.

Another Dark-Circle Seance.

The most wonderful of all the Spiritual phenomena that I hav witnessed I will now describe. One more dark-circle séance was to be held at Mr. Keeler's house, and I determined to be there. My husband had another engagement and could not go, but my aunt went with me. It was a wet evening, and only ten persons came, seven of whom were men. Mr. Keeler was loth to hold the séance, but yielded to the persuasion of several of us.

The ever present Wash soon made his appearance, but could not speak above a whisper. He said the long-continued wet weather was unfavorable to materialization. He came out several times and said, "I only come to fill in the time until others are ready to come to their friends." He was alwavs ready for a joke, and to explain matters to us. He asked some of us to move our chairs, which we did. Then he walked past me and sat on the sofa just behind me. I rose and looked at him. He sat there about a minute. My aunt had laid her fan and gloves on the sofa. Wash took them up and returned with them to the curtained inclosure. No sooner had he disappeared than out came a little woman in white. She called for a gentleman, who responded and went up to greet her. After some conversation between the two inside of the curtain, he came out and said, "Whose fan is this that she gave me?" "It is my aunt's," said I.

Again Wash appeared, and requested General Lippitt to come up and look behind the curtain. The general obeyed. "What do you see?" said Wash. "It is so dark in here," General Lippitt replied, "and I am so near-sighted, that I can't see very well." "Look in the corner; don't you see?" said Wash. "Oh, yes," the general answered, "I do see a dark figure seated on the stool." "That is all I wanted you to see," said Wash. The dark figure was Mr. Keeler.

And now comes the most remarkable part of the evening's exhibition. I saw my father, who died fifteen years ago, standing at the opening of the curtain. I recognized him at once from where I sat, but did not attempt to go up to him lest I might possibly be mistaken. Soon he pointed his hand toward me, and I asked, "Is it I?" He waved his hand affirmativly and I went up. There he stood as real as when in life. He took my hand in his, which held a handkerchief, just as I had often seen him do in life. He put his two hands on my shoulders, and I placed mine on his sides just above the waist. I then said, "O father! it is my father I am really looking at! O father! press my shoulders tighter!" And he pressed them so strongly that I could feel the pressure of his hands long after he vanished from my sight.

Again I said: "O my dear father! speak to me; say something!" He took one hand from my shoulder and placed the forefinger across his mouth—another characteristic of his.

My aunt came up to the curtain and shook hands with him. She recognized her brother. He seemed to make an effort to stay longer. I could see and feel him swaying as if about to fall, while I was holding on to him tightly. He sank down to the floor, and I could see only his head on the carpet. Then the head rose part-way up as if he was making another effort to materialize his whole body. But the head swayed about as if upheld by an attenuated frame, and then again dropped to the floor.

I think I saw him fully five minutes, and all the time he retained his natural look. He could not speak, but his features were unmistakable.

After he disappeared, Wash came again and said: "The gentleman who was here just now says he never did such a thing as this before, and he don't know what to make of it all; he wonders at all this himself."

My father died suddenly in Duchess county, N. Y., in December, 1872. He was a born skeptic, and so was I. A few months before his death he and I conversed about the question of a future life, and we made a compact that the one who died first would appear to the other if it were possible.

I hav always wanted to witness a good materialization. What I saw at the dark-circle séance May 10th has been described in a former letter (THE TRUTH SEEKER, May 26th). The appearance of my father at the second dark circle was unexpected, and surprisingly real. A gentleman seated next to me said he never saw a better materialization, and had he known my father in life he is sure he could hav recognized him from where he sat.

But now my mother appeared. She called me by name, Vickie. Several others heard it besides my aunt and myself. I went up to the curtain and my mother conversed with me. At my request she gave me a very satisfactory message for my sisters. Among other things, she said: "Did not your father look splendid? He is with me; they are all here. Tell Sarah that Charles is here too, and he is so happy." I could not see my mother's features plainly like those of my father. She appeared to hav a veil over her face, and she disappeared as she did before, at the first dark circle.

Several other good materializations took place, but none better than that of my father. A Zouave came out in full military costume. Mr. Keeler himself came out twice in what is called a transfiguration, personating a spirit and conveying a message to some one present. He looked quite different from any of the materialized forms.

I am now convinced beyond all doubt that I hav seen the spirit of my father and conversed with that of my mother. She was imperfectly materialized, so that I could not recognize her features, as I did those of my father, but what she said to me could hav come from none but her. If there is any deception about these various manifestations, it certainly is not chargeable to the medium, Mr. Keeler.

This is all that I intended to write on the subject, except perhaps to reaffirm what my husband has said in answer to the suspicions of certain correspondents that there might hav been fraud or deception in the slate-writing; but now I hav something to add about the materialization of my father.

Five days after the last dark-circle séance I attended another light circle. I went because I wanted my husband's brother to see the manifestations. He and his wife, who are our visitors, went with us. And he was chosen by the spirit guide to sit with Mr. Keeler. The usual phenomena took place. Among the written messages received was this one, signed by my father, William Osborn:

> Did not I do splendidly the other night? Oh, how real I felt! Would that I might do that again. I am so glad you knew me. I should hav been pained if you had not known me.

I received also a message from my niece. It was a further answer to a question I prepared when I went to get the slate-writing a month ago. It was very significant and unexpected. I am sure I had not communicated even her name to anyone present except those relativs who went from our house. None but ourselvs understood it, and we did not read it until we got home.

The Scripture of The West.

"My text, dearly beloved brethren," said a minister in a Western town enjoying a land boom, last Sunday, "will be found in the gospel according to Matthew, lot 6, block 10." And then the congregation settled back to sleep and dreamed that a railroad ran through the place, and Eastern buyers of real estate were as plentiful as chinch bugs on a Kansas farm.

A New Religion.

Now that the chapters of "The Bible of Nature," by Professor Oswald, printed in these columns some months since, hav been gathered into a book, Liberals will be enabled to better understand and appreciate their scope and intent. Consecutivly studied, they form an outlined foundation for a new religion, if we may use the word to define something which is not a religion—except as all striving after good is religion—but a scientific philosophy of life whose authority is nature and unperverted instinct.

Until the second century of our present era the human race was beguiled by supernatural religions. For fifteen hundred years after that the race was tortured by the insanities of an antinatural religion, yclept Christianity. Now, says Professor Oswald, the time has come to found a religion of nature. His book, therefore, is such an attempt.

Professor Oswald is emphatically a disciple and teacher of right living; and of this right living he would make a religion, and the religion of Secularism and of Freethinkers. Christians, so long as they hold to the teachings of the Galilean apostle of antinaturalism, who promised his heaven to the gloomy world-despiser or ascetic, will see in "The Bible of Nature" only blasphemous rebellion to the theological God of their worship. "Woe unto you that laugh!" exclaimed Christ; "bodily exercise profiteth but little;" "take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on." Following this doctrin gave the world the disgusting ascetics of the early ages. "Blessed are they that do not see and yet believe" elevated faith above knowledge. "Resist not evil," but "submit yourselvs to the powers that be," crushed the instinct of freedom in every true believer. Professor Oswald's Bible takes direct issue with each and all of the antinatural dogmas, and he shows not only their baneful influence and results, but that parallel and along with their discardment by the human race has the race advanced physically, morally, and mentally.

Under the four general heads of Physical, Mental, Moral, and Objectiv Maxims, "The Bible of Nature" treats of the human features of health, strength, chastity, temperance, skill, knowledge, independence, prudence, perseverance, free thought, justice, truth, humanity, friendship, education, recreation, domestic and legislativ reform, forest culture, and the priesthood of Secularism. Of each of these he considers, first, the lessons of instinct regarding them; second, the rewards of conformity to such instincts; third, how these instincts hav been perverted; fourth, the penalties of neglect of nature's laws; and, fifth, how we may reform and be "redeemed." Such reformation and redemption Professor Oswald considers to be the province and religion of Secularism, while the methods are its theology, and every law of health, every principle of freedom, every act of justice or humanity, every advance in knowledge, is an article in its creed. Antinatural religion, or Christianity, has two objectiv points, one of which is inevitably to be reached by the race—heaven or hell in another world. Natural religion, or Secularism, has only one—happiness here in this world. The other world must take care of itself. As a generation of strong parents produces a succeeding generation of splendid children, so must moral living in this world help to advancement in the next, if there be one. But while granting as well as demanding the fullest freedom of metaphysical speculation, the religion of reason limits its proper sphere to the secular welfare of mankind, not engrossing, by musing on the enigmas of the land beyond the veil, the time needed for the problems of the only world thus far revealed.

Such, in brief, is the ground-plan of "The Bible of Nature," upon which is to be built the new religion of Secularism. How different that religion will be from the present mystical teachings of Christianity can be scarcely comprehended! Professor Oswald is unsparing of his criticism of that religion, in the teachings of whose founder and practices of the founder's followers he finds the primary cause of the physical and mental and moral diseases which afflict the people. Colonel Ingersoll was challenged once to say how he could improve the world if he were given infinit power. He replied that he would make good health catching instead of disease. Good health is the text of Professor Oswald's book—the salvation for which he works—the heaven he would hav the race attain. Good health, with good nature, knowledge, and a perpetual striving for progress in science, mechanics, and arts, as means to more happiness—that is the religion of Secularism.

In beginning the publication of this book last July, we outlined its purpose to be to demonstrate the natural basis of ethics, and to expose the immoral tendency of the Christian religion in many of its tenets, against which the author set in contrast the safe standards of natural religion. We feel that Professor Oswald has amply fulfilled the promis made, and that he has given Liberals an invaluable book upon both the destructiv and the constructiv side of Freethought philosophy. "What," asks the Christian, "will you giv us when you hav taken away our faith in heaven and hell?" "Giv you?" answers Professor Oswald; "we will giv you everything in this world that is worth having. We will giv you a healthy body and sound mind, and unto them add all things that make for happiness. Instead of a worship of sorrow, we will giv you a worship of joy. Instead of enjoining you to hate your friends and love your enemies, we tell you to love your friends, and hav no enemies. Secularism teaches the solidarity of human interests, and has no sympathy with those humanitarians who propose to silence the clamors of their famished brethren with consecrated wafers and drafts on the bank of the New Jerusalem. We giv you the real brotherhood of man."

Childish Politics.

In one of the numbers of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL appeared an article with the very suggestiv query, "Are We All Infants?" in which the writer, George Macdonald, cataloged a number of childish acts to which adults of the present time are addicted. Among these were the antics of the male population previous to an election—antics so ridiculous as to deserve the contempt of thinking people. The particular antic which aroused the writer's scorn is the habit the sovereigns of America hav of carrying in procession their oval pieces of metal pressed into semblance of a human face, the portrait of their candidate, which for the time becomes their fetich.

If Mr. Macdonald had not written that article till the present month, he would hav found another illustration of the puerility of political sentiment and the childishness of the average adult in the elevation of a red bandanna handkerchief to an inspiring motiv of action in government. One of our candidates for the next to the highest office in the land has for years wiped his nasal organ on a handkerchief of this description, and the delegates who nominated him and the people who propose to vote for him are now worshiping red bandanna handkerchiefs. "Bandannas" possess more potency in this campaign than the tariff question. They hav replaced the "bloody shirt." Platforms are secondary to handkerchiefs. The candidate for second office is more enthusiastically cheered than the candidate for the first office, and the chief reason appears to be that he wipes his nose on a red bandanna handkerchief. That fiery emblem is counted on to secure the "farmer vote," as indicating that its original flourisher is a humble son of toil. One enthusiastic politician expects to win the "negro vote" with it, as it has always been a favorit piece of cloth with the men and brethren recently in slavery, and every "old aunty's" grizzly locks are covered with a red bandanna handkerchief. Manufacturers are turning out these articles of toilet by the hundreds of thousands, storekeepers are selling them as fast as manufactured, and the adult infants of the country are wearing them in pride and expected triumph. Even a great and influential daily newspaper which opposes the platform of its party, argues against its policy, and never could be induced to say a good word for the head of the ticket, now advises its readers to vote for the red bandanna handkerchief, which with that journal seems to weigh more than principles or men, as ponderous as are both the platform and the chief candidate.

What hope is there that statesmanship will ever be shown by political leaders so long as the people can not rise higher than a square yard of calico or silk in making their selection of officers? No doubt the opposing "great" party will hav a fetich as disgusting as this, symbolizing at once the shallowness of the voter and the willingness of the leaders to take advantage of infantil traits. There will be no issue worth talking about, for neither party dares to make one except for spoils. Both trim their sails for favoring breezes, and boxhaul their craft to every local catspaw. They are more anxious to "get there" than to discuss questions of real economic significance. Statesmanship is sunk in politics, and the people are going wild with joy over a red bandanna handkerchief. It is disgusting.

Manifestations and Miracles.

The day the Diss Debar case was given to the jury the World said:

"Prosecution for belief in Spiritualism, or any other kind of belief, is not defensible under any enlightened code of ethics. But it is safe to say that the rights of no one will be invaded if so-called Spiritualism is interfered with when it takes the shape of money-making. The 'Spiritualist' who hires himself or herself out as a means of communication between the living and the dead is a proper subject for the police. The Spiritualists who perform cheap tricks with pictures or scribbling on the inside of slates, with the ulterior purpose of getting money out of their deluded victims, should be in the penitentiary. If there is truth in Spiritualism the best service that can be done it is to rid it of its false prophets or humbugs. Meanwhile society has a right to protect itself against tricksters and swindlers who seek the cover of an alleged belief under which to perform their rascalities. This is the World's platform on Spiritualism, which seems to be misunderstood in some quarters."

That is rather a weak condemnation of religious persecution, but the rest of the paragraph is so much weaker that the first sentence may be considered strong. Why are Spiritualism and the acts of mediums singled out, and parallel faiths and the preachers let alone? Christianity "takes the shape of money-getting" every day and everywhere. Would no Christian's right be invaded if the receivers of cash were tried for obtaining money under false pretenses? Every preacher is supposed to be a means of communication between this world and the next, the living and the dead; and what are miracles of Knock and Lourdes, and others of the same nature, but cheap tricks to obtain money from deluded victims? Can anyone obtain money under pretenses more false than the saying of mass for the souls of the dead, or building a weeping virgin whose eyes are connected with a hydrant? Take the average orthodox preacher, too, who not only tells his congregation all about the condition of the dead but assumes to know the will of the ruler of the universe—can anything be more false than his assumed knowledge? If the mediums should go to the penitentiary, so should the priests and preachers of Christianity! "Society has a right to protect itself against tricksters and swindlers who seek the cover of an alleged belief under which to perform their rascalities." This ought to be the World's platform on Christianity as well as on Spiritualism.

The fact of the matter is, no faith or belief should ever be put on trial, no matter how superstitious or silly or absurd. Actions only are properly punishable. In the Diss Debar trial the defendant should not hav been asked whether she is a Spiritualist or a Christian, and her counsel should hav been prevented from making it virtually a trial of religion. The question was, Did she and Diss Debar and others form a conspiracy to obtain money from lawyer Marsh? If this were proved, then she should hav been compelled to refund the property, and should hav been punished. If there were no conspiracy, if Marsh is a sane man and voluntarily gave her the property, then whose business is it but his own? We undertake to say that there is more influence used on religious devotees to squeeze money from them than was used on lawyer Marsh by Madam Diss Debar. The Catholic church has performed thousands of "miracles"—as really sleight-of-hand as anything Madam Diss Debar has done—to impress upon her dupes the necessity of parting with their fortunes for the benefit of the church. Why should not the friends of the young woman who gave the Catholic church a quarter of a million to build a "university" in Washington proceed against the priests who influenced her as well as the friends of Marsh against the woman to whom he gave a house to be used as a "temple of truth?"

There is altogether too much of this "paternal guidance" spirit manifested to-day, and the newspapers are among the chief sinners. The women make rules for the children, the men enact laws to govern the women, the educational boards assume the right to teach us religion at public expense, the Prohibitionists want to manage our stomachs, the churches desire to control our actions on Sundays and our beliefs on all days, the municipal government won't let us hang a sign on our own premises, most states won't let us denounce the Bible, the federal government makes laws to regulate the morality of our reading, and the "Brooding Buddhas" of the "great" daily newspapers superintend the whole lot. The poor, weak individual, as Bill Nye would describe him, stands a mighty poor chance of doing anything of his own volition. The present tendency is diametrically opposed to Jefferson's clearly stated doctrin that that government is best which governs least, but, instead, regards that government best which governs most. Let's get back to Jeffersonian principles and let everybody alone until he or she injures some one in person, property, or reputation. Spiritualism has the same right to its manifestations that Christianity has to its miracles.

Started On Its Rounds.

The Galveston News reprints editorially the insinuation of the Boston Transcript that a passage in Colonel Ingersoll's eulogy on Roscoe Conkling was plagiarized from Buckle. Probably the story will be repeated in all the little Christian sheets of the country. Here are the two passages:

COLONEL INGERSOLL ON CONKLING.

"Vanity rests upon the opinion of others—pride on our own. The source of vanity is from without—of pride from within. Vanity is a vane that turns, a willow that bends, with every breeze—pride is the oak that defies the storm. One is cloud; the other rock. One is a weakness; the other strength."

BUCKLE'S "HISTORY OF CIVILIZATION IN ENGLAND."

"Pride depends on the consciousness of self-applause; vanity is fed by the applause of others. Pride is a reserved and lofty passion, which disdains those external distinctions that vanity eagerly grasps. The proud man sees in his own mind the source of his own dignity, which, as he well knows, can be neither increased nor diminished by any acts except those which proceed solely from himself. The vain man, restless, insatiable, and always craving after the admiration of his contemporaries, must naturally make great account of those external marks, those visible tokens, which, whether they be decorations or titles, strike directly on the senses, and thus captivate the vulgar, to whose understandings they are immediately obvious. This, therefore, being the great distinction, that pride looks within, while vanity looks without, it is clear that when a man values himself for a rank which he inherited by chance, without exertion, and without merit, it is a proof, not of pride, but of vanity, and of vanity of the most despicable kind. It is a proof that such a man has no sense of real dignity, no idea of that in which alone all greatness consists."

A Sun reporter, seeing this in the Transcript, took it to Colonel Ingersoll's office and asked him what he had to say of it. "What hav I got to say of it?" replied the colonel. "Nothing. The fellow that imagined he was proving something by that is an idiot. Read the two. I hav nothing to say. Take the first sentence of Buckle. I do not know what it means. Take the whole of it. If I could not get at an idea without going all that roundabout way to get at it I would take a car. I am willing to let them stand side by side and let any sensible man judge. The fellows that get up these things really compliment me. They seem to be afraid that I am going to get ahead of God. When they see a good thing of mine they immediately want to charge me with getting it from somebody else.

"I see that another idiot has been writing to the Sun that he has discovered that part of my address at the grave of a little child in Washington some years ago was produced by taking sentences from Buckle's essay on Mill's 'Essay on Liberty.' I never read the book, and therefore could not hav taken the extracts from it. Some time ago one of these pious fellows took that address of mine and turned it into blank verse, and added a word here and there and published in a newspaper an article saying that he had found this blank verse in a newspaper, and that it was the original of my address. I offered to giv $10,000 if he could produce that newspaper. Well, he did not produce it. Now, I will ask you to take a copy of that address. Read it for yourself. If you can find a sentence in it that was ever written anywhere before that address was written by me, I will giv you $10,000. What I cannot understand is how people can be so mean as to write such lies. Nobody but pious people could be so mean. Take a copy of the address, and I will giv you $10,000 for any sentence in it that was written by Buckle or anybody else but myself."

Thus evaporate two more stories which no doubt afford the pious much edification. Yet these charges of plagiarism will circulate and be believed, and every Infidel in the country will be called upon by some Christian neighbor who has read them in his church paper to defend the colonel against the malicious attack. A good way to settle these credulous mortals will be to say: "Here, if you want to make ten thousand dollars, just go to work and prove that Colonel Ingersoll ever plagiarized from anybody. The colonel offers this sum, his word is good, and he has the cash to pay if he loses." That will end the discussion.

A Wise Judge.

Junius Rochester, judge of the probate court of King county, Washington territory, is one of the most subtle logicians that the boundless West has produced. He is also, it gives us pleasure to add, a firm and consistent upholder of the American doctrin of a real separation of church and state. The Seattle daily Press published in its issue of May 15th Mr. Rochester's decision refusing to appoint the Rev. Samuel Greene administrator of the estate of Conrad Hartman, deceased, for reasons which seemed to him good and sufficient, as follows:

"Mr. Greene is a Christian minister activly occupied and engaged in his work as such, and, otherwise, the testimony shows, is a 'suitable and competent person to administer such estate.'

"Section 1,388 of the code of Washington provides that in case of the failure of any person entitled to administer upon an estate to apply for letters . . . 'then the probate court, or judge, may appoint any suitable and competent person to administer such estate.'

"The only question for determination here is whether a man who has dedicated his life, talents, and energy to the service of Christ as a minister of his church, is a suitable and competent person to be appointed an officer of the probate court within the purview of this statute. The discretion to determin the question of suitability and competency of the applicant for letters rests in the probate judge.

"I desire to state, by way of preface, my high appreciation of the Christian church and the Christian ministry, when confined to their own proper functions. There does not appear to be one charitable motiv in this application, but, so far as I can see, it is only a business proposition. Down to a very recent period in England, all matters pertaining to the settlement of estates belonged to the ecclesiastical courts, and after repeated collisions between the judges and bishops, in 1857—only thirty years ago—courts of probate were established there. In America, however, it has always been recognized—since the adoption of the federal Constitution in 1789, at least—that liberty was only possible in a total separation of church and state. The founders of civil and religious liberty recognized and declared this principle in the first amendment to the Constitution, and if there is any distinguishing characteristic of American liberty, it is separation of church and state, absolute and total separation of the secular and ecclesiastical. All experience shows that where the clergy meddles or interferes in politics the church becomes supreme and she has always abused her power to the destruction of liberty.

"And further, if in this case the petitioner is an honest man, 'called of God' to preach his gospel, then I presume from my experience and observation that he is totally unfit to conduct the financial affairs of others, especially of an estate in the condition of this.

"If he is not such a man, then he is a hypocrit, an impostor and cheat, and is not worthy of any position of trust.

"With these views, I can but conclude that petitioner is not a suitable person to be appointed administrator.

"I desire to say, in conclusion, that so far as I know the petitioner is a worthy Christian minister, and I take pleasure on that account in refusing the prayer of his petition, as I think such duties are unworthy his exalted calling.

"A judgment will be entered in accordance with this opinion, and the clerk of this court is ordered to enter this opinion at large upon the journal of the court."

There is a delicacy of argument in this opinion, as well as a comprehension of the evils of ministerial interference in secular affairs, which appeal to one's sense of the "eternal fitness of things" at once, and stamp Judge Rochester as a true and discerning American. His summing up of the experience of the human race in all affairs where preachers hav meddled is absolutely accurate. The church has always, everywhere, abused, and probably will forever abuse, her power to the destruction of liberty. The history of every country affirms and demonstrates this statement. Every true American, therefore, will do what he can to keep the clergy out of politics and secular matters in general.

There is also another characteristic in this opinion which commands our sympathy. It is Mr. Rochester's tender solicitude for the ministers as evinced by his desire to keep them pure and unspotted in this world of sin and temptation, and the gentle manner in which he expresses his regard for their welfare. Judge Rochester has evidently noticed that the honest minister, the one with whom a man's character or his wife is equally safe, is usually a good, easy-going, childish sort of a person, a little weak on Calvinistic theology as well as in worldly enterprises, a man who nowadays would be said to be in the ministerial profession because nature had so constituted him that he wasn't good for anything else, while the bustling, eloquent, popular clergyman lacks the confidence of the business world, which keeps an eye on his accounts and also on the female lambs of his flock. The first minister is of course totally incapacitated by his simpleness of character from undertaking the management of estates, while the second would require altogether too much watching to be allowed to do so. Recognizing these diverse but equally potent reasons, and being desirous of saving the church from scandal, Judge Rochester has chosen wisely in denying letters of administration to the Rev. Mr. Greene. His sympathetic opposition is as forcible from the standpoint of the heirs to the estate as his legal objections are to supporters of a secular government.

THE preacher who gave to the public the indecent scandal upon the home life of President Cleveland has apologized. But no apology that he has the ingenuity to frame can repair the wrong done to the man he attacked. The private life of the president is not a subject for discussion, because whether he and his wife get along smoothly is no one's affair but their own till one or the other chooses to publicly seek release. In this instance the attack was the more infamous because totally false. It, shows, however, that preachers can interfere in politics only by scandal or bigotry. The Rev. C. H. Pendleton, of Worcester, Mass., and the Rev. Mr. Burchard, of this city, ought to go into retreat together.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. D. SHAW, of the Independent Pulpit, intends coming North in September of this year, and desires lecture engagements from Texas to Massachusetts—in Missouri, Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, the New England states—in fact, all through the Northern and Eastern states. He is anxious to make the acquaintance of the Northern friends, and puts his terms very low, as follows: For one lecture, $10, and for three in one place, $25, provided that, in both cases, the hall and advertising are furnished and his hotel expenses paid. The fees pay his railroad bills, and for further compensation he depends upon the sale of his books and the subscriptions to the Pulpit. Mr. Shaw prefers that the amounts be raised by contribution, so that the lectures may be free. We hope that Mr. Shaw will receive a hearty welcome from all societies and individual Freethinkers, and as many engagements as he can fill. He is a superior speaker, a cultured gentleman, and a good man to hav for a friend. Let the North open her arms to the South.

Letters from Friends.

St. Johns, May 17, 1888.

Mr. Editor: Please find inclosed $5—$4.50 for The Truth Seeker, and fifty cents for the "Field and Ingersoll Discussion." Please do not miss a copy of The Truth Seeker, as I want to get it bound. I could not get along without it. We hav no churches here, only a Catholic; but we hav a minister who preaches in the court house. His average congregation is about six—four women and two men. We hav a free Sunday. Everybody does as he likes.

Yours respectfully, T. Rollins.

Puxico, Mo., May 24, 1888.

Mr. Editor: Please find inclosed $2 for The Truth Seeker for Dr. S. S. Hayden, of Carthage, Mo. Please annex him to my club. I shall send the money for the rest of the old club in a few days; hav some of it now on hand, and expect to enlarge the club to ten members if I hav good luck. Dr. Hayden is getting ready for the lecture field, and will soon be on the wing. He gave us a lecture at Asherville on the 19th inst., which gave the people something to think of for some time.

Please drop the appended name from the club, and stop his paper. His wife worries him so much on account of the paper that he has concluded to giv it up. He is all right, but lets go for the sake of peace. G. R. Braley.

Salt River, Mich., May 26, 1888.

Mr. Editor: It is often affirmed by Christians, and especially lately by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, that our nation is a Christian nation. They seem to be plotting for God in the Constitution, Jesus Christ to be acknowledged as the ruler of nations, the Bible to be acknowledged as the revealed will and word of God and to hav the same forced into our common schools. To all of this scheme I am unalterably opposed. I believe Christian people are in favor of Woman Suffrage more for the accomplishment of their purpose than for any other reason. I am in favor of Woman Suffrage, and would vote, as I often hav voted, for it. There is a big battle to be fought some time in the future over their plottings. My prayers are that the spirits of the founders of our government will be near us and sustain us against their nefarious schemes. I believe, as W. F. Jamieson does, that "the Christian clergy are a source of danger to the American republic." All their plottings prove it.

Respectfully, H. O. Bigelow.

Mr. Editor: I inclose a clipping from the San Francisco Examiner. This is the sort of stuff that is often presented to the "unsophisticated" Westerner by the sensational school-boy journalists of the Coast. The Rev. Richard Medway, mentioned in the clipping, probably had an aggravated case of the "James" when he perceived the monster "hovering like an evil spirit." It is not unusual for the elect of God to be afflicted in this manner out West:

A remarkable story of a flying serpent comes from Darling county, South Carolina.

The report is that on Sunday evening Miss Ida Davis and her two young sisters were taking a walk in the woods, when a huge serpent appeared above them, moving through the air with the speed of a slow-flying bird. It did not seem to be very high in the air, and moved without any visible effort. It appeared to be about fifteen feet long and ten inches thick.

The girls stood spellbound until the formidable-looking object was out of sight. The flying serpent was seen by several other people in a different part of the county early in the afternoon of the same day, and they tell all sorts of stories about its appearance.

The negroes are considerably excited over the matter and think it a sign of the approach of judgment day. Revivals will be held in their churches.

At the village of Grassland, ten miles to the southeast of where the aerial monster was seen by the Davis sisters, a panic was caused among the inhabitants by the approach of the creature. The steeple of the Methodist church is crowned by a weathercock in the form of a gilded dove. The last rays of the sun caused this dove to glisten brightly, and the eyes of the serpent were attracted by it. Descending in its flight, it soared to within a few feet of the dove, and circled slowly around it, as if moved either by curiosity or a desire for prey. Suddenly it appeared to discover the inanimate and inedible nature of the dove, and, with a furious swash of its tail, knocked the weathercock from its fastenings and sent it to the ground below in a hundred pieces. Some of the fragments picked up are stained with blood, showing that the monster's tail came into contact with the stout iron rods by which the dove was held in place.

Rev. Richard Medway, pastor of the church, vouches for the accuracy of the details here given. He was approaching the sacred edifice at the time, on his way to hold the evening service. His wife, who was on his arm, fainted at the sight of the monster hovering like an evil spirit over the church. Mr. Medway says there can be no doubt of the aphidian nature of the creature. His description of it agrees substantially with that given by the Davis girls.

Freethought, the latest offspring of The Truth Seeker, is flourishing under the able management of Putnam and Macdonald. May it liv and grow in strength. Freethought is destined to hav a permanent home in this cosmopolitan land of the West, for we are a merry, liberty-loving race of Bohemians here who liv because we hav to liv and giv no thought to the future. In Anacreontic phrase, "We eat, drink, and are merry, for to-morrow we die."

Desiring you ever to command me to the extent of my capabilities and means in the cause of Freethought, I beg to remain, as ever, Yours truly, W. J. Tobin.

McMinnville, Ore., May 27, 1888.

Mr. Editor: The Truth Seeker and Annual came to hand in good shape. I like the paper very much, and especially the cartoons. I think I shall be able to send you a few new names this summer, as Freethought literature is coming in more demand and growing more popular. It's not an uncommon occurrence now for a strict church-member to pick up a copy of The Truth Seeker and scan its pages for an hour at a time. There is any amount of persons that will read Freethought papers if they do not hav to pay for them—persons, too, that are not penurious or pickayunish, but simply take no apparent interest, or not sufficient interest to send off for such literature on their own account. With what I see of The Truth Seeker, if I was able financially, I would send back and hav you send your paper to quite a number. That, I know, would be the means of doing good; for I do know that that was the means employed to open my eyes. An old subscriber sent me his papers when he had them read; hence I became a subscriber, and not only a subscriber, but I am going to work for The Truth Seeker and Investigator as long as I liv. I am not yet through with my spring work, so that I can get out and canvass for truth and liberty. A. T. Gant.

Mr. Editor: There was a large, attentiv, and intellectual audience at the Friendship Liberal League meeting to listen to Miss Voltairine de Cleyre's lecture. Her subject was, "Convent Life Unveiled." After a recitation, rendered in a very able manner, she began her discourse by taking her audience to the convent; after viewing the beautiful grounds and buildings, she entered, taking her hearers through the different apartments; lifting the veil, showed the methods of teaching—how the wills of pupils are crushed, health impaired, character destroyed, by a system devised for the purpose of making brides of Christ or capturing estates, totally unfitting them for wives of men. In a very eloquent manner she showed the suffering of the inmates; lifting the veil still higher, she showed the parts generally hidden from public view. It seems almost impossible that such a system could produce any good results.

The speaker is young, able, and fearless, and is doing a good work and should be encouraged. Those desiring a good lecture should engage her services. The subject of her evening lecture was, "Justice," and Jehovah was handled in a very able manner. The lecture was interspersed with sparks of humor, and was highly appreciated. The large audience present showed an increased number of the fair sex. After the lecture, criticism being invited, and the able Christians being unable to summon sufficient courage to reply, Mr. Brotherhead, a scholar of deep research and great learning, felt compelled to take issue with the lady, whose address, he stated, was the most wishy-washy stuff he had listened to for some time coming from a woman of her sex, and he seldom descended to debate except with polished scholars like Mr. Charles Watts. He carefully avoided anything the lady had said. The speaker in closing replied that if wishy-washiness was a characteristic of her address they had been listening to a woman of the other sex.

After the close of the lecture Mr. Bair, the president, presented the speaker with a beautiful bouquet, the gift of Mrs. Harker, the mother superior of the League, to whose maternal care the League is much indebted, which was accepted, with thanks to the donors, in a becoming manner.

Miss Voltairine de Cleyre lectures next Sunday in Pittsburgh, Pa. Hoping she may meet with the same success elsewhere, I remain, Respectfully, J. B. Elliott.

Concord, N. C., June 6, 1888.

Mr. Editor: The county commissioners of this and several other counties ordered local option elections for June 4th. Such a spectacle as I witnessed here Monday I never had expected to see. J. M. Odell and son operate a cotton factory here. Monday morning they hired two omnibuses, each drawn by four horses, each horse covered with blue bunting, with Prohibition mottoes worked on them. Each omnibus had banners on top, with objectionable—to the Anti-prohibitionists—paintings. All this cost money, say $50 to $75. All Prohibitionists, white and colored, got free rides. The social line of color was broken down for one day, but raised as high as ever next morning, and a barbed-wire line at that. J. M. Odell marched the male employees, men and boys, to the court house and stood sentinel over them all day to see that each man who is privileged specialis gracia of J. M. Odell and son voted just as he was told to do. This is slavery and tyranny mixed in about a two-thirds proportion of each. These are the same men who work women and children twelve and a half hours each day and are pillars in the church of the meek and lowly Jesus. These are the men who persecute all who differ with them in piety and their way of doing God's work; while J. M. Odell's moral character is not to be envied.

There were local elections in Raleigh, Durham, Charlotte, Statesville, and Asheville, where the religious tramp Rev. R. G. Pearson has been laboring at from $250 to $300 per week. All these towns went wet. Raleigh and Durham were dry last year. So much for Brother Pearson's preaching and a special outpouring of the spirit. The reverend gentleman will raise his holy eyes toward the moon or the stars, clasp his delicate hands, and say, "O God! thy works are mysterious, and thy ways past finding out!"

The law of North Carolina is for the justices of the peace at their biennial meetings to elect a county superintendent of the school board of public instruction. June 5th the magistrates met. Rev. T. W. Smith, a regular drone, began to electioneer for the place. He approached our justice of the peace and informed him as an argument that "Brother C. G. Montgomery is doing all he can for me." Our justice of the peace informed Mr. Smith that if C. G. Montgomery was enlisted for him that was enough and he could not vote for Mr. Smith. C. G. Montgomery is a bloated bankrupt for $20,000, but a pillar in the church, a Sunday-school lecturer, and a rampant Democratic politician. Rev. Mr. Smith found other justices of the peace of the same opinion, so much so as to be convinced that it was useless to put in a claim. Here is another instance where God has hardened the hearts of sinners and they hav refused to return the bread that God's chosen servant had cast on the waters. J. W. Mehaffey.

Highlands, N. J., June 9, 1888.

Mr. Editor: I hav always read with great interest the "Letters from Friends" pages of your paper, and long ago would hav contributed some news from this section, but always thought best to leave the space for those who could probably advance better, or at least more telling, ideas to help the cause of Freethought, but since I see in this issue, June 9th, the production of the "Infidel-Smasher," I cannot resist the temptation to at least tell of my contempt for so imbecil a Christian as this one effort to answer an Infidel's question shows him to be. If any relation exists between man and beast, surely he must be of first kin.

In the first place, he starts out to answer sixteen questions; and really I cannot find an answer to even one. The most important one mentioned he does not attempt to answer intelligibly, and he jumps at once to giving advice, something which evidently he himself is in great need of, and advice such as he can only obtain by reading some of the writings of more intelligent and better informed historians than exist in the orthodox church. But really I fear he is past redemption, as, whatever the limit of his intellectual capacity, it is certainly full to overflowing with the teachings of superstition—which college is the only one he has passed through—and that teaching from the Bible—a book I really do not believe he has ever directly read; if so, the parts only that "pulpit-stampers" hav chosen as best for followers. I would answer the questions that he asks, but they hav been answered often, and their answers stand out now to the world in brilliancy through the works of Thomas Paine, Colonel Ingersoll, Kersey Graves, and hundreds of others, and, last but far from being least, The Truth Seeker, a stumbling-block that all Christian advocates fear to find circulated. But never while the American flag can wave can The Truth Seeker be put down; and to satisfy "Mr. Smasher" we shall certainly blow our bugle louder and louder, that the world—not only a few, but the whole world—will soon hear the bugle of The Truth Seeker. And let me say right here that it cannot do more good than to fall into the hands of just such beings as Mr. Streline, as you will notice whenever a fool wishes to advertise himself it happens in just that way—no other means left but ridicule, and always of his superiors.

No better chance than now, Mr. Streline, to enjoy heaven. Make it yourself and you are sure of the articles it is composed of. Heaven and happiness are impossible without liberty, and certainly none teach or advocate liberty, equality, and human rights more than Infidels; and surely none can die more peacefully than those who hav followed the advice of Infidels, especially the advice of the peerless Robert G. Ingersoll and Helen H. Gardener.

In conclusion let me say to the "Infidel-Smasher," that he would better giv out his work to some one not so mentally afflicted as he seems to be, and if he cannot liv without being a "smasher" of some kind, I would suggest that he apply to Mr. Watson Heston for a subject to practice on.

William A. Johnson.

Wabash, Ind., June 8, 1888.

Mr. Editor: Methinks I hav just awakened from a horrid nightmare. A short time after I was forced to suspend the publication of Rights of Man through the boycott of the Knights of Labor I attended a séance, at which I received some manifestations that not only set me to study more fully the phenomena of Spiritualism, Spiritism, or Spiritology—call it what you may—but led me to blindly follow this (to me) ignis-fatuus; I then received a prediction upon the faithful carrying out of which by the spirit world I was to be assured that it was a truth that we liv on beyond earth life. The purport of the communication was: I was soon to run a paper in the interest of the spirit world, and the minute I did this success was to crown my efforts. Carried completely away with the idea that unseen forces were at work to enable me to again sling printers' ink at the mud walls of theology, I became insane, as it were, upon that subject; like primeval man seeing the actions of nature which in his ignorance he could not understand, so I worshiped at a shrine of mysticism as profoundly as he. With him ignorance was the activ force, while I, though not bound in ignorance of that nature, had been so carried away with the desire to enter again the journalistic arena that my mind's perception was dulled to that extent that I was not able to comprehend and rightly digest the manifestations presented to me. The time came when I started that paper, and I never made so complete a failure, and in rapid succession every prediction that was based upon it failed. I had no business to undertake it, knowing that as surely as I did the miserable enmity of the Knights of Labor would be visited upon it; but out of it good has come, for I no more see men as trees walking. While I do not deny the phenomena—call it Spiritualism, Spiritism, or Spiritology—yet I am now more sure than ever that I know actually less and less of it as a fact, a truth. I am satisfied, too, more than ever, that from its peculiarity and similarity in many respects to the dogmas of theology the church will use it to a greater or less degree to carry out its nefarious ends—to blind progression to the real issue before every Freethinker, complete Secularization of the state. When, and only when, Secularism prevails from the East to the West, to the North and to the South, so that the church has no foothold in this church-cursed land, can we safely investigate these phenomena. As it now stands, it is so like theology one needs to be continually making excuses for its erratic shuntings.

In the great work of humanitarianism we, as individuals, need to be alive to the necessity of unification on Secularism, concentration of our mentality upon the destruction of bigotry and superstition, agitativ and educational moves all along the line. In conclusion I wish to go on record that, after a careful and exhaustiv study, I want no life beyond, for all its devotees promis us but an airy nothingness. Life as a substance that can pass through solids without leaving an imprint I do not want. For instance, in this life I meet those I love—that hand-shake, that embrace, those passionate kisses, are something tangible. As I fold that lovely form in my arms I feel the breast rise and swell with love's emotions. I gaze into those eyes of pearl, and deep down therein I read the response of love, and in the kiss I sip such nectar as is denied the gods. This I do without fear of that form's sliding through the wall and leaving me but a deceptiv dream, as it would be liable to were it a spirit form. Though I can do but little, yet that little I am doing for the destruction of myths and the advancement of Secularism.

ARTHUR C. EVERETT.

MR. EDITOR: My notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER brings many letters from various parts of the country, and if I could materialize in half a dozen different places at once I could scarcely fill the "calls"—not from God but from man—to preach. I giv from five to seven lectures each week. I find they hav got Freethought bad in every neighborhood all among these mountains and hills. The people on this coast are emphatically ready to listen to the utterance of the most Radical ideas. Last Sunday evening I gave a lecture by invitation upon "The Origin of the God Idea," in the Hall corner of Third and Alder streets, this city, to a crowded house, which was listened to with the closest attention and best of order. My most telling blows at the old hydra-headed monster were long applauded, and apparently well received by all. After the lecture of thirty-five minutes, Mrs. Finnegan, a platform test medium from San Francisco, Cal., occupied the rostrum, giving descriptions of spirits that she saw, clairvoyantly, standing by friends in the audience. Some of these were very touching, and created great interest and inquiry for more knowledge in Spiritology. I like this term, "Spiritology," very much better than "Spiritualism." We hav had "ism" enough—"ism" everywhere, until the whole world is groaning from its weight of superstition. If communication with the powers and forces that be can giv us facts—and facts are stubborn things—then let us build a Spiritology, but no more ism, please. Many of Mrs. Finnegan's visions or descriptions were recognized and verified. Here, as everywhere else, the Spiritualists are divided, part having great reverence for the Bible and the God idea, prayer and praise to the creator, while the other half are Freethought to the core, and Ingersoll, with them, is before Jesus. The latter will work with the Liberals and for the religion of humanity, and are our best helpers in getting up lectures. May their visions and prophecies and facts—if they are facts—soon settle forever the question, "When a man dies shall he liv again" and keep up his personality? We all naturally ask, as we continually are struggling to gain more knowledge, will this wisdom be of use to us after death? And as Colonel Ingersoll says that "another life is just as likely as this one," why not? Who can fathom the possibilities of nature? As she has furnished the supply for any demand that the inferior creatures may make, is it likely that the same good mother will deny the greatest demand, or boon, that her superior creatures may ask for—immortality? Professor Fowler, in his work on "Self-Culture," says that the organ of spirituality is the least developed of any of the cranial organs, hence we cannot discern spiritual things any better than a person with small Tune can distinguish the difference between "Yankee Doodle," "Hail Columbia," "Away Down in Dixie," or "Auld Lang Syne," or than one with Color small can notice the difference between yellow and orange, violet and blue. Then why not cultivate spirituality by trying the spirits? Who knows but that he may be entertaining angels unawares? Who knows but that a part of himself is so organized that the crash of death—or the pain of another and higher birth, as our Spiritualists put it—will not, cannot destroy us, and that, like the butterfly that comes forth from the defunct worm, we may plume the wing for a flight celestial? Not that we hav a spirit that is not matter, but that we may hav a quality of refined matter, like the ether between the stars, that is indestructible and that will keep up its individuality through all the eternity of the future. Science demonstrates, if it proves anything, that there is nothing in existence but matter, but it certainly does not tell us the end of matter nor all the possibilities wrapped up in it. Sister Elmina seems to think that where there is so much smoke there may be some fire, and I would add, where there is so much fog, there is pretty likely to be water from which it comes. I think this is the way that D. M. Bennett looked at it. Cannot the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER be as free from prejudice as its founder?

If you want lectures, write me. D. C. SEYMOUR.

DES MOINES, IA., June 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In the United States alone, it is estimated that there are twelve millions of pronounced Spiritualists. How near the truth these figures approximate there is, nor can be, no statistical basis for determining; but of quasi Spiritualists—those who from lack of evidence are not actual believers, yet from concurrent testimony are compelled to suspect it true—it would probably not transcend the fact to say there are twenty-five millions in the country at present; and when it is remembered that the large majority of believers essayed its investigation with the confident expectation of "showing up the fraud to the world;" that they "went to scoff, but remained to pray," it certainly seems that it is time to be respectful toward a claim that has extorted such world-wide avowal of its truth. And yet Mr. Talmage has the assurance to tell all these people that they are lunatics and fools; that not more than one instance in a hundred of pretended spirit manifestations is true, and that the true one is from the devil, "the father of lies."

If the Lord was afraid that the walls of heaven would be scaled by the builders of Babel six thousand years ago, we marvel that he can "keep cool" while the Brooklyn clown is rearing a monument of egotism so cloud-piercing that it becomes another "Jacob's ladder" for the audacious and adventuresome to mount up on to that dizzy hight. As Felix, after the oratory of Paul, was "almost persuaded to be a Christian," so does our shattered faith recuperate in the veritable speaking of Balaam's ass, since the same phenomenon has so recently repeated itself in the City of Churches.

A truth that learned scientists, astute judges, critical investigators, and intelligent millions hav given in adhesion to is too pueril for the acceptance of Mr. Talmage. He diets only on the solid pabulum of the "fall"—of the Lord placing a temptation before unsophisticated beings, which he, being omniscient, knew they would yield to; then waiting six thousand years, while the race poured like a Niagara, an unbroken stream, into hell, he finally concocts the plan of coming down to earth, holding commerce with a woman of his own creating, becoming his own father and his own son, indicts himself as a malefactor, acting the triple role of judge, jury, and hangman, and as he expires under his own sentence, an earthquake, an eclipse of the sun, the rising of the dead, the splitting of the veil of the temple, all come in together to lend éclât to the grand wind-up. Then, again, Mr. Talmage takes unlimited stock in the beauties of a Calvinistic revival powwow; in which the Big Ghost, which is both a third of a God and at the same time the whole, though omnipresent, "comes near" and pours himself out into the hearts of the progeny of the "fall," and after getting things lively, then what?—why, the devil—a being who, according to Milton, was once an angel of light and sat so near the throne that he almost rubbed elbows with Jahava himself, but who, in that place where no sin or temptation can exist, became inflated with ambition and was incontinently kicked out, and after falling "nine days and nights" lands in hell, where he stays about as long as a jaybird would sit on a cornstalk or lightning lay on a limb, then scoots out and goes on a still-hunt for Adam and Eve game—comes stealing in, and when said Big Ghost gets a herd of sinners nicely corraled and is about to noose them, said devil—who only works by permission of the other ghost—collars them and whispers something seductiv in their ears about keeping along on the old track and having a good time, when—pull Big Ghost one way and the devil by permission the other—the farce ends by the devil becoming the victor, and it is said in dolorous deprecation that the heartless sinners "hav grieved away" the Big Ghost, and it takes its flight from where it fills all space back to heavenly regions. During all this interesting performance, the "son"—who, too, is only a third of a God and yet the whole—is stationed in poetic fancy at the right hand of the inexorable "father"—who, "out of Christ, is a consuming fire"—where he is supposed to be constantly teasing and wheedling the vengeance-breathing father to save "just this one more sinner," all for his sake—thus the pitiable farce is supposed to go eternally on.

This is the kind of a poultice the reverend Brooklyn clown binds to the aching heart of humanity as a panacea for all its spiritual infirmities; while the indorsement of Spiritualism by the Hares, Edmunds, Crookes, Wallaces, Varleys, Zöllners, Uellenbachs, Flammarions, who combated it with every weapon known to the armory of science, with the view of disproving it, is only an exhibition of lunacy in Mr. Talmage's estimation, which should apparel its doctrinaires in strait-jackets and consign them to insane asylums for safe-keeping.

Does anyone suppose that Mr. Talmage, with a congregation of one-half or two-thirds Spiritualists, believes his own preposterous claims? Not at all does he! Per contra, Shakspere had his case square in the apple of his eye when he wrote, "Well know they of what they speak, who speak so wisely." The trouble, and sole trouble, in the case is, Mr. Talmage did not inaugurate Spiritualism. His monumental egotism is wounded and left out in the cold by his being left to be only a follower, instead of being the originator and leader in the movement. Yet even this he would not hav been, had he had evidence piled as Ossa upon Pelion, as it would—in his conceit—hav imperiled and compromised his social standing, and, last but not least, menaced his fat salary.

No true Spiritualist finds fault with honest skepticism, which is but the negation of the fruition consequent upon thorough, crucial investigation, as in the case of the array of savants whose researches led them into the inevitable field of knowledge and acceptance of Spiritualism as a truth. No man ever lived or will liv who could not wish that true which demonstrates the continuity of existence beyond the brief period of life in the physical form. Why, then, at this late day, when Spiritualism with its tens of millions spans the habitable globe, deride and befoul that which constitutes the very warp and woof of human aspiration and desire? None but another Timon of Athens would be guilty of such braggadocio and contempt of existence. V. C. TAYLOR.

EAST RANDOLPH, N. Y., June 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The letter I wrote March 28, 1888, and which was published in your valuable paper May 5, 1888, has caused considerable comment among the "gentle angels"—many of whom are pretenders, as, I am happy to state, some of them regard the "burning lake of fire and brimstone" in the "hereafter" as I do Lake Chautauqua, that is, just as a comfortable summer resort. But it is a commonly accepted fact with the ignorant, brainless believers who know no better that when death kisses down my eyelids my soul will be clutched by their God and God will damn me for writing about his "sheep in wolves' clothing." "He made all things and saw it was good"—ha, you big, addle-pated cranks, how, then, if "all things are good," can God damn even me? Out on all such nonsense! According to the dogma, "All things are good," then human want and suffering and degradation, such as are seen from the Bend in Mulberry street, New York; disease and pestilence, that throttle young life in its dewy morn, and cause loved and loving mothers to lay their darling babes beneath the sighing maples and moaning willows of regret in that somber "city of the dead," Greenwood; whatever inspired the massacre of Thessalonica a long time ago, and the massacre of the Huguenots on St. Bartholomew's Eve not long ago; whatever it is which moves crime and vice; and low cunning, which has been, is now, and is yet to be—oh, how long?—enacted upon the world's stage—all these things are good.

I say No! with a big N! It was not good to hav a fire set in O. C. Wood's hotel barn the other night and cause eight buildings to be burnt up on men who could not hav stood the loss, were it not for the small insurance they received. It was not "good" for our citizens to witness the three new graves in our cemetery this week—one of them the grave of Mrs. Ackley, a noble, activ, and ardent Freethinker and Spiritualist; a kind mother, wife, and an esteemed citizen; who loved the good and whom all the good did love; who blessed the world seventy-nine years with a life as pure as light and as stainless as a star.

It was not "good," it did not make Mr. and Mrs. John Hammel happy, to follow their little baby and only son to his "worldly home."

It was not "good" for Louis Foy to be sick with consumption, die and leave his wife and little children.

When I read my Bible—which, by the way, is very seldom lately—I am amazed to think so many people in the past countenanced it. And according to all the Christian fathers it was part of God's revelation that earthly misery and suffering is but a faint reflex of that which awaits hereafter; that the "world's people"—especially in East Randolph—are doomed to an eternity of agony in a literal and undying fire. "The wretched bodies of the condemned shall simmer and blaze in those living fires" (Ante-Nicene Christian Library, vol. xi, p. 35).

What a warm place hell was, and what a cool place now! How vast the change that's taken place since Calvin's time! "Forever harassed with dreadful tempests, they shall feel themselvs torn asunder by an angry God, and transfixed and penetrated by mortal stings, terrified by the thunderbolts of God, and broken by the weight of his hand, so that to sink into any gulf would be more tolerable than to stand for a moment in those terrors." Jonathan Edwards says: "The sight of hell's torments will exalt the happiness of the saints forever." Again: "The world will be converted into a great lake or liquid globe of fire—a vast ocean of fire, in which the wicked shall be overwhelmed, which will always be in tempest, in which they shall be tossed to and fro, having no rest day or night, vast waves or billows of fire continually rolling over their heads. Their vitals shall forever be full of glowing, melting fire, fierce enough to melt the very rocks and elements; yet they shall feel their torments, not for a million ages, one after another, but forever and ever, without any end at all, and never, never be delivered."

Oh, what a beautiful, splendid "consolation," what a grand thing, your religion is! Alas, that so many ministers like Rev. Mr. Bowen, who preached in Randolph for the Baptists, who got drunk, pounded his wife and little children, and slapped Rev. George Babcock's face in S. W. Thompson's dry-goods store; Rev. G. B. Spencer, who preached at Randolph a year ago, who "fell from grace" and went upon the down grade, should, at the risk of their small souls' damnation, repudiate the "blessed faith" of their savior and Bible!

Rev. Mr. Spurgeon, of England, in his sermon on "The Resurrection of the Dead," said: "In fire exactly like that which we hav on earth thy body will lie, asbestos-like, forever unconsumed, all thy veins roads for the feet of pain to travel on, every nerve a string on which the devil shall forever play his diabolical tune of hell's unutterable lament."

We could multiply citations from standard Christian authorities. But enough. To review the writings of theologians is largely like entering the gloomy dungeons of the horrid Inquisition, where the walls are still stained with innocent victims' blood, and seeing again instruments of torture, covered with rust and the golden hair of youth mingled with hair white as snow.

"Imposture has always worn a crown," consequently we cannot foretell the near extirpation of any of the sects of the Christian religion. But we can see creedal narrowness, like the murmuring waves of old ocean, expanding and enlarging, and welcoming to her broadening Liberalism, new thoughts. And we can see a marked advance in the church-members of to-day over those of one hundred years ago. The old pillars of the church hav mostly wrapped the "drapery of their couch about them" and laid down in the oblivious night of the somber tomb. Religious narrowness has attempted, and on some of the "bramble-tipped" hills of old Cattaraugus does to-day attempt, to make the sunshine of life darkness.

Reader, my letter has been a long one; but in closing I want you to always stand erect by the grand, tranquil column of truth; investigate for yourself, study the pages of history; never be found on your knees before the altar of superstition, and, like Humboldt, be one of the apostles of truth, adding all you can to the knowledge of the human race. Yours truly, R. R. JONES.

A Historical Poem.

The author of the annexed poem, says the Theater, was the late David Everett. He was born in Princeton, Mass., in 1769. He graduated in Dartmouth College in 1789. In the winter previous to entering Dartmouth College in 1784, when a teacher in the grammar school at New Ipswich, he prepared a little poem, to be recited at an exhibition got up in the academy style, composed expressly for Ephraim H. Farrar, to be spoken by him on the occasion, when only seven years of age:

You'd scarce expect one of my age
To speak in public on the stage;
And if I chance to fall below
Demosthenes or Cicero,
Don't view me with a critic's eye,
But pass my imperfections by;
Large streams from little fountains flow;
Tall oaks from little acorns grow;
And though I now am small and young,
Of judgment weak, and feeble tongue,
Yet, all great, learned men, like me,
Once learned to read their A, B, C.
But why may not Columbia's soil
Rear men as great as Britain's isle—
Exceed what Greece and Rome hav done,
Or any land beneath the sun?
Mayn't Massachusetts boast as great
As any other sister state?
Or where's the town, go far and near,
That does not find a rival here?
Or where's the boy but three feet high
Who's made improvement more than I?
These thoughts inspire my youthful mind
To be the greatest of mankind;
Great, not like Cæsar, stained with blood,
But only great as I am good.

—Freethought.

Jimmy In a Barrel.

Jimmy was ten years old when his papa, who was a sea-captain, decided to take the little fellow with him on a voyage to Philadelphia.

And Jimmy thought it must be splendid to go to sea—to be all day, and many days, out on the water; to learn all about the flying jib, the gaff-topsail, the mizzen-mast and the main-top-gallant mast, the bowsprit, the jib-boom and the flying-jib-boom, the rudder and the spanker-beam, the forecastle and the larboard and the starboard side of the craft, and all the other terms he had heard used in his brief life.

Oh, Jimmy had such grand ideas of "a life on the ocean wave, and a home on the rolling deep," and he had some vague notion of coming home fully able to take command of the vessel himself in case his papa should be taken ill or anything unusual should happen to him.

There was a great fixing and preparing of Jimmy's clothing for the sea voyage. There were wool stockings, rubber boots, and flannel shirts, and a tarpaulin hat and an oiled jacket to stand the storms and the dashing of the waves over the sides of the big three-masted schooner, that Jimmy told the boys was clipper-rigged, and the jolliest craft afloat.

At length all was ready and Jimmy stepped high as he swung his hand to his tearful mamma and marched bravely along beside his papa to the dock.

After the usual fuss and running hither and yon, the anchor was pulled in by the sturdy seamen, and the vessel swung off into the stream. Jimmy was going to "stand watch"—oh, yes, and steer—he'd show the sailors, he would, what a boy of ten years could do.

It was the second day out, and there was only the ocean around and about. Jimmy looked east, west, north, and south, and saw only deep, white-crested waves. He listened, and heard but the swish of the great mad billows that just then were being lashed by the wind into angry lions, as he thought. A storm was coming on, and the jolliest craft afloat rocked from side to side. Jimmy began to be sick at his stomach, and his head began to turn around like a top, or seemed to. Jimmy wished he was at home in his trundle-bed.

He was seasick and homesick. Nobody seemed to pay any attention to him, and he felt lonely and forsaken, with a horrible pain at the pit of his little stomach. Poor Jimmy!

By and by the bell sounded for dinner. Boiled beef and plum duff, that was the bill of fare that day.

All hands sprung to their rations, but one was missing. Jimmy was not to be found.

Appetite forsook the men as they began searching for the boy. The poor father was nearly crazed with fear and distress.

"He must hav fallen overboard," said the mate, Mr. Smith.

"Oh, this will kill his poor mother!" said the frantic father, wildly running here and there, and gazing everywhere calling the name of the boy, and imploring him to answer.

"Jimmy! Jimmy! Jimmy!"

But there was no response, and the father, wild with agony, sat on a log and cried as if his heart would break.

Oh, why had he taken him—that little boy?—why had he not left him safe at home?

Oh, how he blamed himself, and wept bitter, unavailing tears! The men all wept in sympathy, and a lonely hush settled down on the yessel, broken only by the wailing wind and dashing billows that seemed in sympathy with the sorrowful hour.

Presently the mate, walking aft, pushed the canvas off, as he supposed, an empty barrel. But it wasn't empty. A little bundle lay coiled in the bottom fast asleep, and very white. "Hello! what hav we here?" said Mr. Smith.

"Come, my boy, this isn't being a sailor at all," and Mr. Smith, with smiles and tears, fished the sleeping boy out of his barrel-bed.

"Woo-oo-oo!" cried Jimmy. "I'm sick! I want to go home—I want to see mamma! Woo-oo-oo-oo-ee!"

The father pressed him to his bosom, too overcome with joy to speak, for he had given him up for lost, and his heart had almost died within him.

Jimmy did not creep in a barrel again that voyage. He recovered from his seasickness, and was an inch taller when he reached Philadelphia, and saw all the sights of the beautiful city. He visited Independence Hall, and looked on the portraits of the great men of the Revolutionary period and all the relics on exhibition there. He went into Girard College, founded by Stephen Girard, the great Infidel, and visited the Fairmount waterworks, and many other places of interest.

When, finally, he got safely back home, he was filled with nautical information, just as he thought he would be, and had many stories to tell of all he had seen and heard on the trip. but he was always a little shy of telling the tale of his mingled home and sea sickness, when he crept into the barrel and went to sleep there, his absence causing such consternation and dismay until he was discovered by Mr. Smith, the mate.

Correspondence.

DAVENPORT, May 26, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I am somewhat interested in the Corner, I thought I would write a few lines. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Freethought, of San Francisco, and thinks them valuable papers. My father and mother are Freethinkers, and I am somewhat a Freethinker myself. We are expecting C. B. Reynolds out here to lecture to us at Davenport before long, and perhaps Mr. Putnam will lecture here this summer. Father is trying to work up the Freethinkers so we can hav some good Liberal lectures.

My brother wrote a letter not long ago and we were all very much pleased to see it in print.

Best wishes to the Corner and its editress.

ANDREW H. SELDE.

OCALA, FLA., June 10, 288.

MISS SUSAN WIXON: Pardon the intrusion of a stranger into your circle of young Liberals. But with your permission I wish to say a few words to the children under your charge. Children: You do not know the joy an old Agnostic feels in seeing your names at the bottom of articles which say, "We do not believe in the absurdities of the Bible;" for if you did your names would not appear there. The church now sees the need of enlisting the children in the cause of Christ; and it uses all means to draw you to it. Music, picnics, and festivals are used to bring you into the fold. As you enter the doors of any church with the intention of joining it, you say by your act, "I am going to believe that meaningless lying. Cruelty is better than honor, nobility, and love. I am going to believe that I was made from mud"—for none but Prohibitionists were made from dry dust. The Bible is surely the work of man. If it was inspired, why did it need revision? In the days when it was written, man was not far advanced from his brutish ancestors. All the noble qualities which you see in a man to-day were wholly wanting in those who wrote the Bible. The animal nature was stronger than the moral nature. Consequently cruelty was one of the many faults of the people in those days. If a sweet girl of to-day writes a book, every page will be a song full of joy and sweetness, murmuring along like the sweet carol of a singing-bird. Her own mind givs her character to her writings. So the Bible, being written by ignorant men, is full of ignorance; written by cruel men, it is full of cruelty, reflecting the men's nature into the God whom they supposed to exist; written by men who loved money, it is full of appeals for money. Christianity requires us to giv, giv, giv. Time, money, sense, honor—all must be given to Christ. But what does it giv in return? Nothing but a mean idea of humanity, a villainous character to woman, a wrong idea of nature, and a desire to get to heaven no matter who goes to hell.

Col. Ethan Allen.

A friend writes: "I was much interested in the review in your last paper of Col. Ethan Allen's book, 'Reason the Only Oracle of Man.' Indeed, reason is the best or truest teacher, and when it is universally accepted as such there will be an end to theology. But my object in alluding to Colonel Allen is to inquire whether you hav his biography for sale among your books. I would like very much to obtain it."

There was a biography of him published many years ago, but whether it is out of the market now or not we are unable to say. It is not in our list of books, nor do we know where it can be obtained. The copy that we saw had a great many amusing anecdotes of him, and among the rest was the following, which contains a very sensible moral:

He was one day riding on a restiv horse on a rough road, and, he being absorbed in thought (perhaps thinking of theology), the horse threw him off, but he managed to keep hold of the bridle. As he lay in the road, in a not very comfortable position, he called on Jupiter to help him up, but Jupiter did not respond. Then he called on Pluto, or the evil one, who is supposed to come without calling, but even he was not around. Finally, getting tired of his hard berth on the stony road, he said philosophically, "Ethan Allen, help thyself!" and arising from the road he mounted his horse and traveled home.

MORAL: When accidents happen, it is useless to call for supernatural aid, as all help at such time must come from a human source.

Masculin Economy.

There lived not very many years ago a short distance from the town of Beaver—which, by the way, is looking like a young bride just now in her boudoir of green hills—a man of extraordinary meanness. I don't think it would be unjust to say that he was a miser.

One day as he was starting out for Beaver to do his weekly shopping—for even he had to buy something for the support of his family—his wife came out and asked him to buy her a darning-needle.

"What's the matter with the one I bought you last winter?"

"The eye's broken out," she replied.

"Bring the needle here," said he; "I'm not going to allow any such extravagance. I'll hav the needle mended."

The woman was wise in her generation, and made no protest. She brought out the broken needle.

The economical farmer rode into Beaver and stopped first of all at the blacksmith's shop. He took out the needle and handed it to the blacksmith.

"I want that mended," he said.

The blacksmith knew his customer, and keeping his face perfectly straight, said that the eye should be made whole in an hour's time. The farmer rode away, and the blacksmith walked across the street and bought a new needle for a cent or two.

When the farmer called again the blacksmith gave him the new needle. The farmer looked at the smooth, polished surface of the steel, and remarked that it was a good job.

"How much will it be?" said he.

"Ten cents," said the blacksmith, and the farmer, as he paid it, remarked that he knew that the needle could be mended, but his wife would hav gone to the expense of buying a new one if he hadn't interfered.

A SMALL boy was delighted one day when a slight fire in his father's house brought the firemen and the engin. "I say," he exclaimed to the first firemen he met, "I say, if there should be a big fire here and you want to save things, please don't save my winter flannels, for they tickle me."

Words for the Boys to Remember.

Liberty is the right to do whatever you wish without interfering with the rights of others.

Save your money and you will find it one of the most useful friends.

Never giv trouble to your parents.

Take care of your pennies and they will grow to be dollars.

Intemperance is the cause of nearly all the trouble in the world. Beware of strong drink.

The poorest boy, if he be industrious, honest, and saving, may reach some of the highest honors in the land.

Never be cruel to a dumb animal. Remember that it has no power to tell how much it suffers.

Honesty is the best policy.

Respect the aged.

Eddie's Reviving Hope.

Indulgent parent: "Eddie, I hav got a lot of planting to do and work is behind this spring, and if you could get excused from school this week, I should like your help dropping corn."

Eddie: "Well, papa, I am behind now with my lessons, and I hav to study real hard to keep up, and I can't stay out no way, as I see."

Indulgent parent: "Well, Eddie, it wasn't exactly planting. The fact is, Roak is going on a trip fishing for a week and has invited you to go, but if you are behind in studies, as you say, I agree with you it would be bad to leave school."

Eddie: "Oh, shoot the school! I ain't so very far behind but what I can catch up in a few days."

Fun and Fancy.

"What does your father do?" asked the teacher of the boy. "He's a contractor," was the reply. "A railroad contractor?" "No, ma'am; a sausage contractor. He ties up the ends after another man has filled 'em."

"I am surprised, Bobby," said his father reprovingly, "that you should strike your little brother. Don't you know that it is cowardly to hit one smaller than yourself?" "Then why do you hit me, pa?" inquired the boy, with an air of having the better of it.—Epoch.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

Courage.

Adhere to thy thought evermore,
And thought shall lead thee from error;
Hav faith in the power of courage,
And thy faith shall save thee—from terror!

Say to thy soul: "Fear naught but fear,"
And chaos shall flee away,
Hope shall sparkle in every tear,
And night be turned to day.

Summer and winter, heat and cold,
Thy ministering angels shall be;
And "old" and "new," and "new" and "old,"
Shall be all the same to thee!

For "up" is down, and "down" is "up,"
And rest and motion are one,
If God and man move on together
In perfect unison!

That Badger Boy At Sunday-School.

THE LESSON OF BALAAM—OR HIS ASS.

The teacher read the story of Balaam, which, save for the jackass episode, wouldn't be worth telling to empty benches, that Badger boy at once getting in his hooks, as it were.

"That Balum was a fortune-teller for revnoo only, as pop says, wasn't he, mum?"

"Yes, James, that was just about what he was."

"Yes'm. He wasn't one of God's profiters, was he, mum?"

"No, dear, he was not. He was one of Baal's prophets, dear."

"Yes'm. Who was Bale, mum?"

"He was just nothing and nobody, James; but the ungodly called him their god."

"Yes'm. He was a noppersition god, warn't he, mum?"

"James Badger, don't you dare to talk like that!"

"No'm. Them ungodly folks wasn't ungodly to Bale, was they, mum?"

"No—yes—well, now you just stop talking anything about it, you boy."

"Yes'm. God told Balaam to go to King Boleg, didn't he, mum?"

"God told him to go to King Balak, you stupid, you."

"Yes'm. What'd he git mad for, then, 'cos he went, mum?"

"Why God's anger was kindled, I don't know, James."

"No'm. Wonder 'f he knew, mum?"

"James Badger, that's blasphemy!"

"Yes'm. All the same, it was durned funny he told Balum to go up over against Boleg, and then got mad 'cos he went, warn't it, mum?"

"You horrid boy, you stop!"

"Yes'm. It must a knocked Balaam galley west, when the jackass spoke out to him, mustn't it, mum?"

"You little slang-whangy thing, you, I don't know whatever you mean, I'm sure!"

"No'm. I mean it must a sot him back, opened his peepers, knocked him stiff, giv him——"

"There, you can stop your horrid lingo just where you are. I won't listen to you."

"No'm. If you was ridin' a jackass, mum——"

"You needn't go any further with the supposition, you little badger, you."

"No'm. Was the jackass a talker from Wayback, mum, or for this er 'casion only, as pop says?"

"Of course he spoke only on that occasion; otherwise it would hav been no miracle, you heathen boy, you!"

"Yes'm. Was it a miracle when the jackass spoke, mum?"

"Of course it was, stupid!"

"Yes'm. Was it when the snake spoke to the Eve woman, mum?"

"Of course it was, you boy."

"Yes'm. Who done the mirricles, mum?"

"God, you miserable little heathen!"

"Yes'm. Then it was God that buncoed Eve, and not the snake, wern't it, mum?"

"Merciful heaven! James Badger, you go home!"

"No'm, please. How obbun yer nice hair—I mean how nice yer obbun——"

"There, that'll do, dear. I'll forgiv you this time. But don't be so wicked again, will you, dear?"

"No'm. What was the matter with Balum's eyes, mum, that he couldn't see the angel, and the jackass could?"

"It was God's doing, the whole of it, James."

"Yes'm. Was it God spoke, and not the jackass, mum?"

"God willed that the animal should speak, James, and it spoke."

"Yes'm. How sot back the jackass must a been, same's Balum, mum! Did he always talk after that, mum?"

"Of course he didn't."

"How do you know he didn't, mum?"

"James Badger, you've said quite enough about the animal, now you stop."

"Yes'm. Why don't you say jackass, mum?"

"Because there's no authority—the Bible doesn't say it, you horrid!"

"No'm. But it says ass, and everybody calls 'em——"

"James Badger, you can go home."

"No'm—please. I'd liked to heard the jackass talk, wouldn't you, mum?"

"No, I wouldn't; there, now."

"Why not, mum? It was God's doin', wasn't it?"

"Of course. And—er—well, we weren't either of us there, James, so say no more about it, please."

"No'm. All the same, it was a big thing, a talkin' jackass, mum."

"James Badger, will you ever stop?"

"Yes'm. Was the angel gonter kill Balum, mum?"

"Yes, dear; and only for the ass he would."

"Yes'm. If the critter hadn't got scart, and had walked over the angel, then Balum would a ketched it, I s'pose, mum?"

"You suppose, do you? Well, keep on supposing, you little monkey, you."

"Yes'm. S'posin' the jackass had brayed at the angel, then the angel would a got on his ear——"

"You horrible James Badger, go home!"

"No'm—please. Would you be scart of an angel, mum?"

"James, I suppose any of us would be. Don't we read that the men of God were bowed with fear before the angels of the Lord?"

"Yes'm. And that one must a been a tough lot, mum, that knocked the jackass silly! What a scarecrow he'd a made in a corn-field, wouldn't he, mum?"

"Oh! oh! oh! you horrid heathen wretch! I shall die. Go home—go. The class is dismissed." Then to an untimely end came the séance of Balaam—or his ass.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

THE NINE DEMANDS

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.
